"Undoubtedly some of the items of the large claim asserted against Mexico by the La Abra Company are shown to have been exaggerated and others unfounded. But this remains when all that can be reasonably said in favor of the interference proposed has been considered—that there was ample evidence before Sir Edward Thornton that is not impugned by any new evidence to have sustained and warranted his award; that the award did not embrace damages on account of the items that have been surcharged or apparently falsified; that that award was far below what was claimed; that it was far below in amount the damages which, in the opinion of unimpugned witnesses, the claimant's company suffered; that it did not embrace speculative damages; that the mistreatment of the company by Mexican officials and people is proved by their own testimony, and that (conceding all that by reasonable intendment the newly-discovered evidence proves) the award made had ample foundation in testimony not successfully impeached, and was not in excess of fair compensation for losses suffered according to that testimony.

"The United States has never undertaken to be themselves the judge of the legitimacy of these claims, nor could they do so. They were a party to the arbitration, not the arbiter. The legitimacy of the claims was the very question submitted to the court of arbitration under the treaty; and while it is true that with an exalted and refined sense of honor, which of its own intuitive impulse refuses the fruit of wrong, the United States will interfere to arrest palpable frauds and impositions practiced by or for the benefit of its citizens. It is also true that they should not attenuate that sense of honor into a Quixotic spirit, and exert their powers to override the most sacred settlements not palpably or apparently obtained by fraud. Were this case reopened by any form of procedure, abundance of evidence would be found unimpeached in the records before Sir Edward Thornton to justify his judgment. The new case, like the old one, would be a case where truth had to be sought under a mass of contradictions, and at the end of it—whatever that end might be—there would be as much room to question the propriety of the decree as there is now.

"Indeed, such a case as this can never be ended save by the finality that belongs to adjudication. Affidavits and counter affidavits—allegations of intimidation and extortion—recantations and recriminations and reassertions bestrew the record, and no one who reads its heaps of testimony (taken without regard to technical rules, and with no sort of discrimination between direct and hearsay evidence) can reach any other conclusion than that the details of exact truth are impossible of ascertainment, and that any decision should be predicated upon the few landmark facts which are established.

"This Sir Edward Thornton evidently well appreciated. He did not discuss the minutiæ of evidence or refer to that of any single witness. He did not award the speculative damages claimed or follow counsel in any of the niceties of their argumentation. With the spirit of a wise chancellor he looked at the facts which rose up out of the débris of testimony, and upon them rested his judgment. Those facts remain, and that judgment, in our opinion, should stand; and we fail to see that the honor or conscience of the United States is concerned to disturb it.

"Mexico had full and fair hearing. The great mass of cases was decided in her favor, and the only maxim which we conceive is now wisely applicable to this claim is that which tells us it is to the interest of the commonwealth that litigation should cease."

The course pursued by the Mexican Government in endeavoring to impeach La Abra award.

By the treaty of July 4, 1868, providing for the settlement of claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico and of citizens of Mexico against the United States, the two Governments entered into the following agreement:

"The President of the United States of America and the President of the Mexican Republic hereby solemnly and sincerely engage to consider the decision of the commissioners conjointly, or of the umpire, as the case may be, as absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided upon by him or them respectively, and to give full effect to such decisions without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever."

The first installment was due upon the awards, and was paid by the Mexican Government to the United States on the 31st of January, 1877. On the 21st of November, 1876, the Mexican agent, Mr. E. Avila, addressed a communication to the Mexican minister at Washington, in which it was stated that at the meeting of the agents and secretaries of the Joint Commission held the day before, the Mexican agent had presented certain statements in writing, with a view that they should be inserted in the record of the proceedings of the day, but it was not so done, because both the agent and the secretary of the United States did not think it proper.

One of these statements was a reservation of "a right on the part of the Mexican Government to show, at some future time, and before the proper authority of the United States, that the claim of La Abra Silver Mining Company was fraudulent and based on affidavits of perjured witnesses, with a view of appealing to the sentiments of justice and equity of the United States Government, in order that the award made in favor of the company should be set aside." The minister inclosed a copy of Mr. Avila's communication to

Mr. Hamilton Fish, who was at that time Secretary of State, remarking "that the manifestations contained in the annexed note of Sr. Avila are in accord with the instructions he has received from the Government of Mexico." Mr. Fish replied to the minister on the 4th of December, 1876, in a letter from which the following sentence is taken:

"I must decline, however, to entertain the consideration of any question which may contemplate any violation of, or departure from, the provisions of the convention as to the final and binding nature of the awards, or to pass upon, or by silence to be considered as acquiescing in, any attempt to determine the effect of any particular award."

The Mexican minister replied on the 8th of the same month that there was no intention to "put in doubt the final and conclusive character of the abovementioned awards;" that Señor Avila had only expressed the possibility that the Mexican Government might at some future time have recourse to some proper authority of the United States to prove that the two claims he mentioned were based on perjury, and that, "if such an appeal should be made, it will not be resorted to as a means of discarding the obligation which binds Mexico, and that, should it prove unsuccessful, the Mexican Government will recognize its obligation as before."

On the 20th of December, 1876, Mr. Fish sent a dispatch to Mr. Foster, who was at that time United States minister in Mexico, acknowledging the receipt of a dispatch in which he had stated that the Government of Porfirio Diaz had applied for a loan of $500,000, and had represented that $300,000 of the amount would be payable to the Government of the United States in the course of the next month. Mr. Fish inclosed with his dispatch to Mr. Foster a copy of a protocol, with an account of the expenses of the Joint Commission, showing a balance of $57,499.01 in favor of Mexico, and suggested that the Mexican Government, if it chose, could deduct the whole of that balance from the first installment of the awards payable to the United States. This was done, the whole of its contribution to the expenses of the arbitration being taken from La Abra award, and the first payment was made on the 31st of January, 1877, as stated.

Gen. Slaughter sends an agent to Mexico.

It appears from the testimony of Gen. Slaughter that the agent whom he employed to go to Mexico, in accordance with the terms of his contract with the Mexican Government, was Mr. Alfred A. Green—the same person who had made a deposition on behalf of the company before the Joint Commission, and had preferred a claim, unsuccessfully, on his own behalf, against the Mexican Government before the same tribunal. Previous to this adverse decision, Mr. Green, who had been much in Mexico, and spoke the language fluently, had assisted Gen. A. W. Adams in taking depositions on behalf of the company in Mexico, but afterwards quarreled with him in regard to compensation. This quarrel is described in ex-Consul Sisson's testimony before the subcommittee (ibid., p. 801). Gen. Slaughter had met Green in Mexico. How they met again in Washington and came to an agreement in this Mexican business is told by Gen. Slaughter as follows (ibid., p. 914):

"Q. Do you know a man by the name of Green?
"A. Yes.
"Q. Did you employ him to assist you?
"A. I sent Green to Mexico to get that press letter copy book.
"Q. When was that?
"A. That was a short time after I signed that contract. I sent him immediately afterwards. I had never seen Green since I met him in Mexico. I had never heard of Green being in the case at all. I accidently met Mr. Green here in Washington, and I had known him in Mexico, and known his brother very well. I walked over to Willard's with him and took a drink and asked him if he knew anything about this business. He told me he did, and went on to tell me what it was; said he thought it was a fraud, and all that sort of thing.
"Q. We do not care anything about that.
"A. I asked him, 'Green, can you get me the evidence of this thing?' He says, 'Yes; I can.' Says I, 'Would you be willing to go to Mexico and get these papers for me?' He said, 'Yes; I would.' I said, 'When will you go?' He said, 'Any time.' 'Very well,' says I, 'I will pay your expenses and send you out there and give you so much if you will go out and get these papers.' And I sent him, and he furnished the Mexican Government—did not furnish me—but in reply to my sending him out there this pressletter copy book was sent back through the Mexican Government to Washington, directly here. It did not come to me at all.
"Q. Now, did you have any written agreement with Green as to what he was to do?
"Mr. FOSTER. I object. I think we have got to a point where we must object." * * *

Green went down to Mexico on this mission, and while he was in San Francisco he met Capt. Charles B. Dahlgren and told him that Adams had boasted that "he had obtained Dahlgren's signature (to his deposition in behalf of the company) by the use of a good round sum of gold." Dahlgren seems to have believed that Adams, who was largely interested in the award, had made such a statement as that, and he thereupon wrote the letter to Mr. Robert Lyon (Lines) of November 12, 1877, which has been printed in the "new evidence offered by Mexico" as proof that Dahlgren's deposition had been "forged." Dahlgren was examined by the subcommittee, and his examination will be alluded to hereafter. Counsel for the claimant offered affidavits to prove that Green had endeavored to suborn perjury in Mexico in his employment under his contract with Gen. Slaughter, for the purpose of impeaching this award, but the offer was refused by the subcommittee on the ground that the affidavits were ex parte.

To this, counsel replied that the affidavit of William R. Gorham of March 23, 1872, alleging that Green did not sign his deposition which was submitted to the Joint Commission on behalf of the claimant, was ex parte, and that it had not been followed up by the Mexican Government in producing Gorham or Green before the subcommittee, and that it was not fair, after having made such a charge in the formal presentation of its case to the Department of State and to Congress, and having had the benefit of the consequent suspicion, to leave it in that shape. It appears, however, that before he entered into the service of the Mexican Government, under the Slaughter agreement, his character had been assailed by the agent of Mexico in his motion before the umpire for a new hearing of the claim. In his attack upon the company's witnesses (to which the umpire rather drily alludes in his denial of the motion) Señor Avila remarked (Ex. Doc. No. 103, House of Representatives, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, p. 90):

"Neither can be considered as a respectable witness Alfred Green, the pretended liberator of Mexico, who tried to defraud that nation by presenting a fraudulent claim."

Gen. Slaughter employs an attorney in Washington, who employs detectives in New York.

While Green was trying to liberate Mexico from paying all or part of La Abra award, under his subcontract with Gen. Slaughter, by collecting "newly discovered evidence" in the vicinity of the mines, another subagent of Gen. Slaughter was at work for the same purpose in this country. This was Mr. Robert B. Lines, who testified before the subcommittee as to his employment by Gen. Slaughter (Appendix, p. 922). And Gen. Slaughter also testified that he "employed Mr. Lines soon after signing the contract" (ibid., p. 914). Thomas J. Fisher, a New York detective, testified before the subcommittee that he was employed by Mr. Lines in that city early in the year 1878 (ibid., p. 879) "to make the acquaintance (of Exall) and find out if possible from Exall what the facts were; take means to do that."

In his direct examination Fisher testified (ibid., p. 882) that he might have given Exall to understand that if he would unswear what he had sworn to before the Commission, it would be of advantage to him; but that "Gen. Slaughter was very anxious to obtain these facts for the purpose of having Exall indicted." Fisher said it was a pretty hard thing for him to say what his instructions were; that he did not remember of any particular instructions given him at the time (ibid., p. 884):

"Q. Were you authorized to offer him anything?
"A. I never was. Of course I reported and told Gen. Slaughter what he had said and the amount that was mentioned. That was talked over, and Gen. Slaughter distinctly said to me that he did not want to negotiate for a thing, or did not want any proposition made, unless he knew just exactly what were in his possession—find out what he had in his possession.
"Q. 'The amount mentioned.' By that do you mean the $25,000?
"A. Yes.
"Q. Mentioned by Exall?
"A. Mentioned by Exall and Kittelle both.
"Q. Was there any formal offer on the part of Mr. Exall or Mr. Kittelle in relation to the sale of documents; if so, what was it?
"A. Yes, there was on the part of Exall.
"Q. Please state what it was.
"A. Mr. Exall proposed——
"Mr. KENNEDY. Just say what he said.
"The WITNESS. Well, Exall said that if there was an offer made of $25,000 for these papers and documents that he had he would produce them, or that was what he said in substance.

* * * * * * * *

"Q. What did Gen. Slaughter say to you, if anything, as to any expectation of getting evidence out of Exall's mouth to convict him of perjury?

* * * * * * * *

"The WITNESS. I don't remember that Gen. Slaughter gave any instructions to get it in any particular way. The object was to get it. I don't remember whether——
"Q. To get evidence that would convict Exall of perjury?
"A. Yes.
"Q. Now, Mr. Fisher, in these conversations which you had with Exall or Kittelle, did you say anything to either of them as to any protection to be afforded to Exall from criminal prosecution?
"A. No, sir; I don't remember that I ever did. I don't think I ever did."

Mr. Fisher also testified on his direct examination (ibid., p. 823) that—

"The first intimation of documents came from Exall himself. The first that I ever heard in relation to there being any papers or valuable documents in existence came from Exall himself."

But being cross-examined with reference to a time prior to his acquaintance with Exall, Fisher testified as follows (ibid., p. 887):

"Q. Now, can you tell us substantially what it was that Mr. Lines said to you at that first interview; not the very words, but the substance of it?
"A. Well, I remember that he spoke to me in relation to this claim, and that an effort was to be made to set it aside or open it, and that they wanted to have evidence on that point; secure evidence of this award being an unjust one.
"Q. Now, what did he say, if anything, about Exall?
"A. Well, my impression is that he told me that Exall—at least I know that he told me that Exall had been connected with this company as an officer or secretary; that he held a position in the company. I forgot exactly what it was, but that he held a position in the company, and was liable to have books and papers and documents in relation to it that would show the exact state of affairs; the exact amount of the loss that had been sustained by these parties."

And, being pressed in regard to Gen. Slaughter's alleged purpose of having Exall indicted for perjury, Fisher gave the following testimony (ibid., pp. 888, 889):

"Q. Now, what steps, if any, were you instructed to take to show that Exall's testimony was perjury?
"A. Well, as I remember it, my instructions were directed particularly toward getting these papers and documents that he had.
"Q. Well, how did you expect to prove Exall's alleged perjury by documents in Exall's possession that you wanted him to turn over to you?
"A. Well, I had not any knowledge of what these papers and documents were; he never stated what they were, except he stated they were very important and very valuable to the party that Gen. Slaughter represented.

* * * * * * * *

"Q. What did you say to Exall in regard to the testimony that he had already given?
"A. Well, I have not any recollection that I ever spoke to Exall in relation to any testimony he had ever given. I don't think I did. I don't know that there was—I am almost positive there was not anything said on that point. Whether Exall knew that I knew that he had testified I have no knowledge.
"Q. Do you mean to say that there was never anything said by Exall to you or by you to Exall in regard to the position in which Exall would place himself by giving you documents or any testimony showing that he had previously perjured himself?
"A. Well, I believe there was—my recollection is that there was something said upon that point, that the documents that he had in his possession would put him in a false position. There was something said upon that, I remember, but what it was exactly I can not recall.
"Q. Well, how did you meet that objection?

* * * * * * * *

"THE WITNESS. Well, it would be pretty hard for me to say what I told him. I was liable to tell him a good many things for the purpose of getting evidence out of him.

* * * * * * * *

"Q. Certainly. Now I ask you what you did tell him.
"A. Well, I could not state exactly what I told him.
"Q. Well, give us your best recollection.
"A. Well, I could not tell you from memory what I told him. I have not any doubt that I told him it could be arranged satisfactorily, so that no harm would come to him. I have no doubt I told him that. I have no doubt that I did."

Prior to Fisher's examination George W. Kittelle had testified before the subcommittee that he had consented to be introduced to the detectives, Fisher and Weed, in New York, at the request of Mr. Ely, for the purpose of finding out what their object was in approaching Exall, and who were their principals; and Kittelle had produced a letter written by Fisher to Exall while these negotiations were in progress. When Fisher was examined he did not know that this letter was in evidence, and in his cross-examination he was at first quite positive that he had never been notified by Mr. Lines or

Gen. Slaughter or otherwise informed that the Mexican minister, Mr. Zamacona, was expected to be present at a conference on this business in New York. Fisher's letter to Exall is as follows (ibid., p. 774):

NEW YORK, February 4, 1878.

DEAR SIR: The Mexican minister is expected to arrive in this city either to-morrow or Wednesday, and I should like to see you before I see him. Will you please let me know what time and place it would be convenient for you and I will call upon you? Please address me by bearer or in care of the doorkeeper of the Broad street entrance of the Stock Exchange.

Yours, respectfully,

THOMAS FISHER.

CHARLES EXALL, Esq.

After reading this letter Mr. Fisher was examined as to his purpose in writing it, as follows (ibid., p. 908):

"Q. Exactly. In other words you wanted to get a little more definite information in regard to these papers before you communicated with the Mexican minister as to the $25,000. Is not that so?

"The WITNESS. I say that I did want to get from Exall information before I communicated about the $25,000.

"By Mr. WILSON:

"Q. Well, you had already received from him the statement that he had these papers?

"A. Certainly.

"Q. You had already received from him the statement that he thought they were worth $25,000 to the Mexican Government?

"A. Yes, that he thought so.

"Q. That he claimed they were worth that; you had received that?

"A. Yes.

"Q. But you had not received any definite information as to what the papers contained?

"A. I had not.

"Q. But you had communicated before this time to Mr. Lines or to Gen. Slaughter what Exall had said to you about these papers?

"A. Undoubtedly.

"Q. Yes, you had communicated that to Gen. Slaughter and Mr. Lines?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Very well; but you were not able to communicate to them what the papers contained or to give them very definite information as to what they were?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. And you wanted to get a further interview with him in respect to these papers?

"A. Yes.

"Q. And so you wrote him this letter; is that it?

"A. Well, I don't remember exactly what the object was in writing that letter to him, but it was something in relation to that.

"Q. Well, you wrote him this letter after you had received all this information?

"A. From him?

"Q. Yes.

"A. Undoubtedly.

"Q. And after you had communicated what you had received from him to Mr. Lines and Gen. Slaughter?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Now, you say to him that 'the Mexican minister is expected to arrive in this city either to-morrow or Wednesday, and I should like to see you before I see him,' and you say that when you wrote that letter you wrote it with a purpose of getting more definite information about these papers?

"A. I did.

"Q. We will leave that right there. Now, will you tell us who paid you for your services in this matter?

"A. Mr. Lines."

Mr. Lines's negotiations with Mr. Elder.

Mr. Lines at this time was also negotiating with another former employé of the company, Mr. A. B. Elder, for documents which he claimed were in his possession, and Mr. Elder had sent a letter which he had received from Mr. Lines to Gen. Bartholow, who, it will be remembered, was one of the company's stockholders, and its first superintendent at the mines. In this letter, which is dated at Washington January, 17, 1878, Mr. Lines alluded to the negotiations which he was conducting through the detective Fisher, with Exall in New York, as follows (ibid., p. 635):

"Exall is in New York. I have not his address, but my agents are in communication with him, and he shows, as I am informed, a disposition to purge himself of the false swearing into which he was undoubtedly led by older rascals."

The expression—"to purge himself"—used by Mr. Lines at the time, shows that he and his principals—Gen. Slaughter and the Mexican minister—were trying to induce Exall to "unswear" what he had sworn to in his depositions on behalf of the company before the Joint Commission, and swear to a different state of facts. In his own testimony and in his examination of Mr. Elder, Mr. Lines was careful to discriminate between documentary evidence, which he admitted he would have advised the Mexican Government to purchase, if of the kind desired, and one's own affidavit, which he held could not properly be purchased. He also said that when he wrote to Elder that Exall was showing a disposition "to purge himself," he did not use the expression in its technical sense.

But Mr. Lines's unstudied statement in his contemporaneous letter to Elder, taken in connection with Mr. Kittelle's positive testimony on this point (ibid., pp. 768, 772, 773), and the probabilities indicated by the situation, would show conclusively that it was new testimony from Exall himself, under oath, as well as any books or papers of the desired character he might possess, that the Mexican Government, by its agents, was trying to obtain. On this point Mr. Lines testified as follows (ibid., p. 928):

"Q. Now, you go on to say, referring to Exall: 'And he shows, as I am informed, a disposition to purge himself of the false swearing into which he was undoubtedly led by older rascals.' Who was it that gave you that information?

"A. Mr. Fisher. He informed me that Exall claimed to have papers, documents, and to be willing to furnish them.

"Q. No; but you say that 'he shows a disposition to purge himself of the false swearing.' What did you mean by that?

"A. Well, I did not use that in the technical sense. I was not corresponding with a lawyer, and I meant merely that Exall showed a disposition, as I was informed, to furnish testimony which would show the truth of the matter.

"Q. Well, do I understand you that if a man who had sworn falsely was willing to sell documents in his possession for a good round price that you would call that purging himself?

"A. I would not call it so in a conversation between you and me, but in a letter of this kind I might do so. That was all I meant, at least, by the expression."

But Mr. Elder, who was produced before the subcommittee as a witness on behalf of the Mexican Government, had written to Gen. Bartholow, inclosing an alleged "verbatim" copy of a portion of another letter received by him from Mr. Lines, which reads as follows (ibid., p. 636):

"[Copy of a letter from R. B. Lines to A. B. Elder, copied by A. B. Elder.]

"Verbatim.] WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1878.

"Your evidence backed by these memoranda in view of your position ought certainly to be conclusive. Sundell said in Sept. the ores were all there. The lobby in behalf of the Co. finding itself unable to suppress investigation is now trying delay it with more success. Just when it will commence is still uncertain. Let me know what you will furnish the memoranda sworn to by you and Exall letter for.

"Exall is in N. Y., and I think in a few days we shall have his papers. My agents are in communication with him in N. Y., and he is weakening very rapidly. I shall be glad to forward to him anything you may offer. I do not know his address, as everything is done through my agents.

"There is much in the letter not in this.

"[In pencil:]

"Yours, R. B. LINES.

"A. B. ELDER.

"I have an offer to go to China. Silver mines there. Do you want any stock in the company? The prospects are good. Maybe so; dividends."

It is only fair to Mr. Lines to say that in his testimony before the subcommittee he said (ibid., p. 930):

"These words, 'sworn to by you,' I am very positive were not in any letter I ever wrote to Mr. Elder."

In one of his own letters to General Bartholow, Elder states plainly what the Mexican authorities wanted from him and what they had offered him for it. He had fixed the price at $10,000, and the following was evidently intended to draw out a bid of something over $8,500 for his wares (ibid., p. 639):

LONE PINE, CAL., April 5, 1878.

Gen. BARTHOLOW:

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 24th ultimo come duly to hand, and contents noted. I sent to you a few days since a postal card asking the return of Mr. Lines's letter. If you have not already started it, you need not be in a hurry about doing so. In a letter from Washington a few days since they, through an agent, have offered $1,500 less than I asked them; they want my deposition and the letter and memoranda, and I think I will accept, as I have been losing in the sheep business for the last year.

As for the company for China, it is not perfected yet. I will let you know more of it soon.

Hoping, yours, truly,

A. B. ELDER.

Elder's letters to Mr. Lines had been printed in the "new evidence offered by Mexico" with certain insinuations and charges against the company, the falsity of which was shown by Mr. Elder's cross-examination before the subcommittee, as follows (ibid., p. 593):

"Q. Now, I wish to direct the attention of the witness to the statement of the Mexican Government, on page 428 of Ex. Doc. 103, under the title of 'New evidence offered by Mexico.' I will read you a sentence or two:

"'Herewith are transmitted the originals of certain letters addressed by A. B. Elder, the assayer for La Abra Company, to the Mexican minister and Mr. Robert B. Lines. Mr. Elder desired to find a market for the knowledge which he possessed of the affairs of La Abra Company. He was informed that if he had any documents, clearly authentic, bearing upon the case, there might be room for a negotiation, but that affidavits were not regarded as purchasable. Mr. Elder claimed to have such papers, and was asked to produce them and name his price. This, as his letters show, he failed to do, and the correspondence with him was dropped. He appears, however'—and this is the point to which I invite your careful attention—'he appears, however, to have found a market for the letters addressed to him in reply by Mr. Lines.' Now, I want to ask you whether it is a fact that you ever found any market anywhere for the letters addressed to you by Mr. Lines.

"A. Never in the world, sir.

"Q. Is there the slightest foundation in fact for the assertion of the Mexican Government which I have just read to you? Did you ever offer any of Mr. Lines's letters for sale to anybody?

"A. Never.

"Q. Did you ever receive anything for any of Mr. Line's letters from anybody?

"A. Not one cent.

"Q. Did anybody ever offer to pay you one cent for any of Mr. Lines's letters?

"A. Never."

Elder not only contradicted thus explicitly the intimation in Mexico's "new evidence" that he had found a market for the letters addressed to him by Mr. Lines, but he also testified to the falseness of the charge which the Mexican Government had made against the company as follows (ibid., p. 595):

"Q. Now, I invite your attention to another sentence in your letter of April 8, 1878, to Mr. Lines: 'Through some party to me unknown, I am offered a good show to go to China to look after a silver mining company's affairs.' I ask you who it was that made you that offer?

"A. Well, I don't know who it was that made me that offer.

"Q. I ask you whether you have any reason to suppose that it was made to you by any officer or other party interested in La Abra Company?

"I have no reason to believe so. Such propositions were often made to me.

"Q. It was nothing uncommon?

"A. Nothing uncommon.

"Q. You had been mining how long?

"A. Ever since 1853.

"Q. Now, I want to invite your attention to the statement made by the Mexican Government in regard to that China business, on page 430 of that same document, No. 103, under the title of "New evidence offered by Mexico." I now read to you, Mr. Elder:

"'Either Mr. Elder has exhausted La Abra treasury, or else the persons conducting the affairs of that company have swindled him, as they did their other witnesses, by failing to carry out their contract and send him to China.'

"Now, I ask you whether there is the slightest foundation in fact for the allegation that you had any contract with any officer of La Abra Company, or with the company itself, to go to China, or for the allegation that they swindled you by not sending you there?

"A. None whatever.

"Q. Can you think of any reason for such a statement being made?

"A. I can not imagine any. I certainly never received any such proposition from any member of La Abra Company."

It will have been observed that the "offer to go to China" was communicated by Elder in his letter of February 17, 1878, to Gen. Bartholow (supra), and not by Gen. Bartholow to Elder. It is certainly quite a remarkable feature of this recent investigation by the subcommittee that one of the most serious charges made against the company by the Mexican Government in its formal presentation of its case to Congress and the Department of State, should be proved false by one of its own witnesses, and that witness of all men necessarily best informed as to the fact.

It seems clear that if Elder's memorandum book had really contained what he said it did, he would have sworn to its correctness and sold it to the Mexican Government, but he never produced it, or any other papers, although he received the following considerate assurance from Mr. Lines (ibid., p. 635):

"You may rest assured that there is no disposition to take advantage of your voluntary offers or to use your information, which is of unquestionable value, to your prejudice."

Elder failed in his efforts to use Mr. Lines's letters as an inducement to Gen. Bartholow or La Abra Company to enter into competition with the Mexican Government for what he had to sell, and he had shown himself so evidently purchasable, or Mr. Lines was so sure that he had nothing worth buying, that in preparing the statement of the "new evidence offered by Mexico," Mr. Lines dismissed him, but nevertheless printed his letters and availed himself of the occasion to make a charge of the most infamous conduct on the part of the La Abra Company, which, according to the Mexican Government's own showing before the subcommittee, was without any foundation or color of excuse.

After a lapse of ten years the Mexican Government seems to have thought that something could still be made out of Elder, and he seems to have thought that something could still be made out of the Mexican Government. He was subpœnaed on behalf of the Mexican Government by the subcommittee on the 14th of January, 1889, in a telegram from the Sergeant-at-Arms informing him that he would be allowed mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile each way and $3 per day while detained in Washington (ibid., p. 622). He responded immediately:

"I must see money, and more than you offer, before I leave home."

The Sergeant-at-Arms replied:

"You will be allowed [no] more than the law allows, and the United States Senate commands you to come."

To which Elder responded:

"I am not of the kind that works for $3 per day, nor will I leave here without money to pay all expenses liberally, and I will come near having something to say about it."

This was January 16. The same day he telegraphed again:

"Send $500. Will leave on 20."

Elder seems to have been in some confusion of mind, for he testified on cross-examination, in explanation of his telegrams, that he did not know which side had subpœnaed him, and that before reporting to the Sergeant-at-Arms he went to see the company's counsel in Washington. He thought that perhaps it was the company that wanted him.

As a sample of the manner in which Mexico would impeach Sir Edward Thornton's award in this case, if the Senate bill under consideration should pass and the Court of Claims should take jurisdiction, some extracts from Elder's cross-examination are appended (ibid., p. 625):

"Q. Did you report to the Sergeant-at-Arms when you arrived in Washington?

"A. I did not,

"Q. How long were you in Washington before you reported to the Sergeant-at-Arms?

"A. I got in Friday after 9 o'clock.

"Q. When did you report to the Sergeant-at-Arms?

"A. Monday morning. I was sick Saturday and Sunday; did not get out of the hotel.

"Q. What day was it that you were at Judge Shellabarger's office?

"A. That was Saturday morning.

"Q. Now, will you swear that you did not say to me, in the presence of another person sitting in the same room, that you had put a value of $10,000 during the time that you were corresponding with Mr. Lines upon the memoranda and the letter mentioned in that correspondence?

"A. I believe I said so to you, and I consider that if the memoranda was worth anything it was worth that to a party——

"Q. Why did you come to Judge Shellabarger's office before you reported to the Sergeant-at-Arms?

"A. I supposed from that telegram that La Abra Company caused my being summoned here.

"Q. Did you not have at that time a letter in your pocket, dated December 28, 1888, from the consul-general of Mexico at San Francisco, informing you that your presence was required here as a witness?

"A. I did.

"Q. Did not you show that letter to Mr. Kennedy in the conversation that took place at Judge Shellabarger's office?

"A. In your office?

"Q. Well, it was my office; put it that way.

"A. Judge Shellabarger referred me to you. I supposed from the nature of the telegram that it was——

"Q. The question is, Did not you show to Mr. Kennedy in his office the letter now in evidence addressed by the consul-general of Mexico at San Francisco to you, dated December 28, 1888, informing you substantially that your presence would be required here as a witness in this La Abra investigation?

"A. I presume I did."

Following is the letter from the Mexican consul-general at San Francisco, which, it will be observed, is dated about three weeks earlier than the subcommittee's subpœna (ibid., p. 573):

DECEMBER 28, 1888.

DEAR SIR: It being necessary, in the interest of justice, that your testimony be heard by the committee of Congress in the matter of the "Abra" claim, your expenses to Washington and back will be paid, as also during your stay at the capital. Will you kindly answer at your earliest convenience, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,

A. K. CONEY.

Mr. A. B. ELDER, Santa Clara.

Some light is thrown upon Elder's motives and expectations in the subjoined passage from his cross-examination (ibid., pp. 624, 625):

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, proceed, Mr. Kennedy, if you please, to lay your predicate.

"By Mr. KENNEDY:

"Q. I want to ask you, if you please, Mr. Elder, whether on or about the 19th day of January——

"Mr. FOSTER. The present month.

"By Mr. KENNEDY:

"Q. Whether on or about the 19th day of January, 1889, while you were crossing the bay in California on a ferryboat, you met a man by the name of Alexander S. Gillespie, or any man at all, to whom you said that you had been subpœnaed to Washington City to testify in reference to some old claim between American capitalists and the Mexican Government; that you were an assayer of minerals, etc.; that the claim was about some mines in Mexico; and whether you further stated that the Mexican Government had promised you $50,000 if you would give evidence favorable to them. Also, whether you said that unless the other party gave you more money, you would likely give the kind of evidence required?

"A. I met a man on the ferry and we were talking. He said he was a blacksmith, said he had been here, and I told him. He asked me which way I was traveling, and he had been to San José hunting a job as a blacksmith. I told him I was coming to Washington, and I said I had been summoned there by telegraph of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate in an award claim of some citizens of the United States against the Mexican Government. He remarked, 'Is there much money depending?' I said, 'Yes, I think there is nearly $1,000,000.' 'Well,' he says, 'they ought to pay you well to go on such a trip as that.' Now, as to my saying that the Mexican Government had offered me $50,000, that I never said. There was talk that they ought to pay me for a trip of that kind. I said, 'I presume they will pay me. I don't know, but the Sergeant-at-Arms says I will get 5 cents a mile. It will be almost like riding on the boom to get there and back.' I says, 'If anybody gives me anything it will be voluntarily.' I says, 'I can not demand anything for my evidence.' What I know is simply what I knew at the mill, and the thought of getting any stipulated amount has never entered my head.

"Q. Did you say anything about the other party?

"A. La Abra?

"Q. The company?

"A. Not a word that I recollect of; not one word.

The letter referred to in the foregoing extract had been received by Mr. SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and handed to Mr. MORGAN, chairman of the subcommittee. The letter is herewith appended, with the agreement of counsel in regard to it (ibid., pp. 687, 688):

"The CHAIRMAN. It is agreed by counsel that if Alex. S. Gillespie were present and under oath he would make the statement in regard to the conversation with A. B. Elder, which is contained in the following letter, and the presence of Gillespie is by agreement dispensed with.

"The letter is as follows:

"OAKLAND, CAL., January 19, 1889.

"To the honorable Chairman Committee on "Foreign Relations, Washington, D. C.:

"To-day while crossing the bay here on ferryboat I met a man who said he had been subpœnaed to Washington City to testify in reference to some old claim between American capitalists and the Mexican Government; that he was an assayer of minerals, etc., and the claim was about some mines in Mexico; and stated further that the Mexican Government had promised him $50,000 if he would give evidence favorable to them; he also said that unless the other party gave him more money that he would likely give the kind of evidence required. He lives at San José, Cal., and will be in Washington about January 26. He is paying his own expenses to Washington for the present, and expects to have a private interview with Señor Romero, the Mexican minister, as soon as he arrives in Washington. Perhaps this may be of service to your committee, as he said both sides subpœnaed him.

"Hon. G. R. Tingle (chief seal-island agent, Alaska), at present in Washington, D. C., knows me, and you can refer to him about trustworthiness.

"Respectfully,

"ALEX. S. GILLESPIE,

Dahlgren's examination.

In availing itself of the opportunity afforded by the Senate to show that La Abra award should be reopened, the Mexican Government called but one of the witnesses whose depositions had been filed with the Joint Commission. This was Capt. Charles B. Dahlgren, whose deposition on behalf of the company had been taken at Mazatlan before United States Consul Sisson on the 18th of September, 1872. Five years afterwards—in November, 1877—Capt. Dahlgren was put into communication with Mr. Robert B. Lines by Mr. Alfred A. Green, who, it will be remembered, had been sent to Mexico by Gen. Slaughter, under his contract with the Mexican Government, "for the purpose of securing testimony in proof of the fraudulent character of said claim." Green met Dahlgren in San Francisco, and made a statement to him, some account of which will be found in Dahlegren's testimony before the subcommittee (ibid pp. 712-715). After his interview with Green, Dahlgren wrote the following letter, which has been printed as part of the "new evidence offered by Mexico" (Ex. Doc. 103, p. 235), and may be found in the Appendix, p. 644:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., November 12, 1877.

"Mr. ROBERT LYONS,
"United States Senate Post-Office, Washington:

"SIR: I have good reasons for knowing that the testimony under my signature, as offered by A. W. Adams in the La Abra case or claim, has been perverted, and is therefore fraudulent, and should be treated as such.

"My testimony was taken in rough notes and left for him to copy or fill in over my signature on a clean sheet, as I was called off on important business.

"I know now that said testimony has been perverted and by said A. W. Adams.

"Very truly,

"C. B. DAHLGREN.

"My address here is: Capt. C. B. Dahlgren, Pacific Refining and Bullion Exchange, cor. Brannan and 7th, S. F.

"P. S. I understand said A. W. Adams boasted he had obtained my signature by the use of a 'good round sum of gold.' Advise me how I can bring him before a court to substantiate said statement.

"C. B. D.

"I refer to Gen. Sherman and Rev. B'y'n Sunderland."

Dahlgren's interview with Green and his opinion of him appear in his testimony before the subcommittee as follows (ibid, pp. 644, 645):

"The WITNESS. I was informed that I had testified in the Abra case, and that my testimony had been purchased for a 'good round sum of gold.'

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. Who was your informant?

"A. A. A. Green.

"Q. Where does he live?

"A. He is living a great deal in the Republic of Mexico.

"Q. Was he your acquaintance?

"A. He was an acquaintance of mine; yes, sir.

"Q. A man whose opinion you respected?

"A. I knew nothing against him. He had been the original owner of the Candalaria mine, of which I had been the superintendent, and therefore, I had been brought into business contact with him.

"Q. In consequence of that information, what did you do?

"A. He then told me what my testimony had been, and asked me if that was the case. I was very angry, and I then put myself into communication with Mr. Lines and wrote that letter to him."

At that time Green was in the employment of Gen. Slaughter under his contract with the Mexican Government. Green had probably examined Dahlgren's deposition in Washington; at all events, he pretended to be familiar with its contents, and undertook to tell Dahlgren what his "testimony had been." There is no evidence that Green stated the contents of Dahlgren's deposition to him correctly or that Adams had ever said he had obtained the deposition from Dahlgren by bribery. There is not the least likelihood that Adams ever made such a statement, or would have made it even if it had been true, for the award in favor of La Abra Company had been rendered only recently, and Adams was largely interested in it and aware of the opposition to its payment by the Mexican Government, and he would therefore have been the last man to say anything reflecting upon its integrity. But of course Green's representations were calculated, as they were doubtless intended, to make Dahlgren angry and eager to prevent his deposition from being of any further service to Adams or the company.

The measures he would be likely to pursue when in such a frame of mind can be imagined from his conduct as disclosed in the course of his examination before the subcommittee. It will be remembered that Green as well as Dahlgren had a grudge against Adams, and that Green had besides a pecuniary interest under his agreement with Slaughter in making Dahlgren hostile to the company and the award.

Great importance is given to Dahlgren's testimony before the subcommittee by the fact, already mentioned, that he was the only witness produced before the subcommittee by the Mexican Government of all of the witnesses whose depositions were filed with the Joint Commission; also by the fact that it was on his letter of November 12, 1877 (supra), that the Mexican Government based its charge that testimony had been "forged" by Adams in favor of the company's claim; and this importance is enhanced when it is remembered that Dahlgren's examination may fairly be regarded as showing the best that could be done in the way of impeaching the award if the question of its validity should ever be submitted to the Court of Claims as proposed by Mr. Morgan's bill. In this view it is considered proper to examine Dahlgren's testimony before the subcommittee at considerable length.

A critical examination of Dahlgren's letter shows that when it was written—more than five years after his deposition was taken at the United States consulate at Mazatlan—he had forgotten at what length he had been examined, and supposed that a single sheet would have contained his deposition. "My testimony," he says in his letter, "was taken in rough notes, and left for him to copy or fill in, over my signature, on a clean sheet." The original deposition on file in the Department of State contains eight sheets, written on both sides, and signed by Dahlgren near the middle of the sixteenth page. He admits his signature to be genuine, and his testimony shows that his answers to Adams's questions (which answers were not written out by Adams but by Peña) were quite voluminous. These questions and answers, which Dahlgren in his letter calls "rough notes," were, he says, corrected by him—interlined and crossed out to such an extent as to make them unfit for use as a deposition. A fair copy was therefore necessary, and Dahlgren's testimony shows that there was abundance of time for making it, for he testifies that he went to the consul's office "early in the morning," and was there on that business until 1, 2, or 3 o'clock in the afternoon (ibid., p. 659).

The idea that a man of his intelligence, holding the position of superintendent of the Durango Mining Company and consul of the United States, should leave his "testimony" to be "filled in," over his signature, "on a clean sheet," in support of a claim for such a large sum against the Government to which he was accredited in his consular capacity, seems preposterous, and if anybody but himself had made such a charge against him it would have seemed too improbable for belief. All the presumptions would have been against it. This is how it seems to have struck Mr. Lines, for when he was asked in his cross-examination whether he had advised Dahlgren, as requested in his letter, how Adams could be brought before a court to substantiate his charge of bribery, he replied (ibid., p. 927):

"I regard the statement in Dahlgren's letter as a very extraordinary one, and I thought perhaps an improbable one, that he had allowed his testimony to be taken in rough notes in that manner, and I thought that Mr. Dahlgren was much more concerned in the matter than the Mexican Government was, and for that reason I held no further communication with him at all, I believe, after sending him that telegram."

A careful examination of Dahlgren's testimony furnishes the strongest proofs of the falseness of his letter. Before he was examined in the subcommittee he had inspected his deposition in the State Department, where it is filed with the other records of the Joint Commission, and he had seen that the original draft or "rough notes" could not have been copied or filled in "on a clean sheet." So when he came before the subcommittee he testified that his deposition "filled up a number of sheets," and when the chairman asked how many, replied: 'Oh, quite a number; there may have been a dozen or two dozen sheets, a large number of sheets;'" and he continued (ibid., p. 647):

"I then said: 'Gen. Adams, allow me to read over those papers.' He said: 'They are your answers as written down by my secretary, and it is long; it is not necessary; have you no confidence in me?' I said, 'I wish to see those papers, and unless I do they can not go out of this room; I must see them.'"

Dahlgren seemed to have forgotten that the "papers" were of no use to Adams, because at that time they were neither signed nor sworn to. Dahlgren continues:

"He then handed me the sheets, and I read them over. I then said: 'Gen. Adams, those are not the answers as I gave them to you, sir, and I will not allow that to pass for evidence.' 'Well,' he said, 'scratch it out or erase it, as you see fit.' That was done, and then I said: 'Now, those answers are satisfactory to me, and I will sign them,' and I did sign them. He then said: 'That is not fit to hand in as testimony, all scarred up in that manner.' I said: 'You had no business to write those answers in that way.'"

The witness seemed to have forgotten that his answers had not been taken down by Adams, but by Peña. Dahlgren continued:

"And I said, 'Well, I am on the way to San Dimas, and I haven't time to stay longer.' I then called to Mr. Sisson, who was consul to Mazatlan while I was United States consul at Durango——

"By Mr. FOSTER:

"Q. At that time?

"A. At that time; yes, sir. I said to Sisson, 'I will sign a blank sheet of paper and put it in your possession as consul, as between two consuls; you are to transcribe these notes and retain the original, and hand that signature with the transcribed sheets ahead of it to Gen. Adams as my testimony.' Sisson said he would do it. I then jumped on my mule and rode away, 170 miles, back to San Dimas."

It will be observed that Dahlgren said that he signed the original deposition or "rough notes" after his corrections had been made, and, in addition, signed a blank sheet to be attached to the new copy which was to be made by Consul Sisson. Next day, his direct examination still continuing, the chairman inquired (ibid., p. 677):

"Q. Did you affix your signature at all after that single blank sheet of paper; did you sign your name twice?

"A. No, sir; I don't think I did, because it was in such bad shape that I would not."

Dahlgren did not seem to be able to state the same circumstance twice in in the same way. He was greatly troubled about his oath—a difficulty which he evidently had not anticipated. When asked whether he was sworn (ibid., p. 647) he said, "I do not recollect, sir; I do not recollect whether there was any formality in swearing me or not." Asked again after a considerable interval (ibid., p. 650) whether he had any clearer recollection than he had already stated as to whether he was sworn by the consul, he replied, "I don't recollect as to that." But in certain small particulars, not affecting the sense of his deposition, his memory was most wonderful. He seemed inclined to deny that he had said anything contained in his deposition—the mere fact that it was there seemed to arouse his antagonism. For example, his deposition made him say, "The late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren was my father." In his testimony before the subcommittee (ibid., p. 651) he said, "I never said that. To the question, 'Are you or are you not a son of the late Admiral Dahlgren, of the United States Navy,' my reply was 'I am.'"

An examination of the question in the deposition shows that his consular position as well as his parentage was inquired into, and while it might have been properly answered by the words, "I am," instead of the answer contained in the deposition, namely, "Yes; the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren was my father, and I hold the position suggested in the question, and I am so recognized by said authorities," the two answers mean exactly the same; and it is remarkable that after the lapse of seventeen years Dahlgren could have been so positive that he made the one answer rather than the other.

Recurring again to the question whether he was sworn, Dahlgren said (ibid., p. 677):

"A. I recollect when I wrote my name. I have seen the document and recognize my name. I handed it to Sisson. I said, 'Consul Sisson, I put this in your charge, to have this transcribed and written—the rough notes;' supposing, of course, as a colleague of mine, as one consul for another, that he would act for me. I had just received information that imperatively called me away. It was absolutely necessary to go. I could not delay. It was not my business to tell them that (he had testified previously that he did tell them that). When I took this to him he said, 'You swear that this is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?' I said, 'I do.'

"Q. Alluding to the blank sheet of paper?

"A. Alluding to the testimony I had given.

"Q. And you signed a blank sheet of paper and handed it to him?

"A. That is it.

* * * * * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. I will have to take this myself.

"Q. You now state that you were sworn?

"A. Yes; that I was sworn at first.

"Q. No; you state that you were sworn. When the consul that administered that oath to you did so, did he have in his hand or did you have in your hand a paper to which that oath applied?

"A. No, sir."

In his cross-examination the same subject was revived. (Ibid., pp. 706,707.)

"By Mr. WILSON:

"Q. Were you sworn on that examination?

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. Was an oath administered to you?

"A. No; that was administered to me at the beginning.

"Q. Well, was there at the end?

"A. I have stated in my examination that when I signed that paper and handed it to Sisson he said, 'Is this the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?' holding that blank piece of paper in his hand which I had requested him to transcribe.

* * * * * * * *

"I was not sworn until the examination was over, and I handed to him that blank sheet of paper then he said, 'Is this the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?'

"Q. And that is your statement now in regard to it?

"A. That is. That is my statement. That is the only swearing that was done in the matter."

Before Dahlgren's testimony is further examined, it may be as well to refer to the testimony of ex-Consul Sisson in regard to the manner in which Dahlgren's deposition was taken. Sisson, who was subpœnaed on behalf of the company, testified before the committee on that matter as follows (ibid., pp. 792, 793):

"By Mr. KENNEDY:

"Q. Have you examined the original deposition of Dahlgren that is now on file in the Department of State?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When did you first see that document?

"A. When did I first see it?

"Q. Yes; I mean the eighteen pages of which it is now composed.

"A. It was made out in my consulate.

"Q. Now, will you state the circumstances attending the taking of that deposition? I mean the signing of it by Dahlgren, his oath to its truth, so far as you are concerned.

"A. Well, Mr. Dahlgren and Mr. Adams, Mr. Peña, and, I think, Governor Galan, came up to the consulate for the purpose of making out an affidavit.

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. Now, do you mean an affidavit, Mr. Sisson, or a deposition?

"A. I do not mean an affidavit. I mean a deposition.

"Q. In this La Abra case?

"A. In this La Abra case. And they sat down in the office there and went to writing.

"Q. You say they went to writing. Who went to writing?

"A. Mr. Peña did the writing; the interpreter. Adams and Dahlgren were discussing the matter.

"By Mr. KENNEDY:

"Q. What time of day did these gentlemen whom you have named come to the consulate?

"A. Oh, along in the morning sometime. I can not tell exactly what hour they did come.

"Q. Well, now, proceed.

"A. Well, Mr. Peña went to draw up the paper and they talked it over. I was out and in the room while they were at it, and finally it was finished and all written out. I went in there then and swore Mr. Dahlgren, and it was read over to him.

"Q. You mean this identical deposition?

"A. I mean this identical deposition that is in the State Department to-day, or was yesterday.

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. You examined it through, did you?

"A. I did. I swore him—the usual form of oath that was attached there to it—and after it was all through he signed it right there. Mr. Peña witnessed it right there. Then I put my oath to it.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

"Q. That is, the certificate?

"A. I mean my certificate. Then I signed it and put the seal of office to that. Then I turned it over to Mr. Danglada, who put the ribbons through it in the form you see. You see how it is done there, put through and through, brought back, sealing-waxed about the top of it, and he held it up while I put the stamp on that sealing-wax. Mr. Dahlgren, as soon as he signed it, went off."

After reading to Sisson, from the record, Dahlgren's testimony, already quoted, that he had signed a blank sheet of paper, etc., the ex-consul's examination was continued as follows (ibid., p. 794):

"Q. Now, Mr. Sisson, what have you to say to that statement of Dahlgren so far as it concerns you?"

"A. I can say that he signed no blank sheet at all there to my knowledge. What he signed was this deposition of his. What he and Adams did and talked about—they talked a great deal—I can not tell, but this was the result of their work, was the making his deposition there.

"Q. Now I read again to you:

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. There is one part of that you have not answered. He states there that he makes some declarations to you. What do you say about this?

"By Mr. KENNEDY:

"Q. I will read that again to him:

"'I will sign a blank sheet of paper and put it in your possession as consul, as between two consuls; you are to transcribe these notes and retain the original, and hand that signature with the transcribed sheets ahead of it to Gen. Adams as my testimony.' Sisson said he would do it.'

"Now, you have just said that Dahlgren never signed any blank sheet of paper in your consulate to your knowledge, and the chairman invites your attention to what Dahlgren says he said to you about transcribing the notes and your promise to do that. Is that true?

"A. No, sir; I don't recollect any such thing.

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. No, but do you deny it?

"A. I do deny it; yes, sir.

"Q. You say it is not true?

"A. I do.

* * * * * * *

"No affidavit was ever taken there unless it was written out in full as a deposition.

"By the CHAIRMAN (ibid., p. 795):

"Q. Is that your reason for saying that Dahlgren has made a false statement, that you never do business in that way, or do you state it as your recollection in connection with this particular paper?

"A. I state that as a recollection.

"Q. In connection with this particular paper?

"A. Yes.

"Q. That he did not sign a blank sheet at all, but signed the deposition after it had been filled out, and only after it had been filled out?

"A. That is what I say.

* * * * * * *

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. Wait one moment; I wish to ask him a question. This document that you saw in the State Department was drawn up, you say, in Peña's handwriting?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Was that read over to Dahlgren in your presence?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Who read it to him?

"A. Peña, I think, and I think I read some of it myself.

* * * * * * *

"By Mr. KENNEDY (ibid., p. 799):

"Q. You say that every word of the deposition that is now in the State Department was read to the witness in your presence before he signed it?

"A. That is what I intended to say.

The consular clerk corroborates Sisson.

It will have been noticed that Sisson said that Dahlgren's deposition immediately after he signed it had been turned over to Mr. Danglada, who put the ribbons through it and held it up while the consul put the stamp on the sealing-wax. Sisson had previously testified that his consular clerk was Domingo Danglada, a Mexican, who spoke Spanish, English, and French. After Dahlgren had been examined by the subcommittee, counsel for the company made inquiries in San Francisco for Peña—the man who read Dahlgren's depositions to him and subscribed it as witness—in order to have him subpœnaed, but found that he was dead. It was discovered, however, that Danglada was still living at Mazatlan, and when the company's counsel requested that he should be subpœnaed (agreeing to bring him to the boundary line between the two countries), the following telegraphic correspondence was admitted in evidence by consent in lieu of his personal appearence (ibid., p. 638):

"Mr. FOSTER. Before you adjourn we will answer the opposition that we reluctantly, and in order to avoid any excuse for further delay in this investigation, will admit that Danglada, if present, would swear to this statement contained in the telegram.

"The CHAIRMAN. I will read it. Shellabarger & Wilson, counsel of La Abra Silver Mining Company, sent a dispatch addressed to Domingo Danglada, at Mazatlan, Mexico, dated February 21, 1889, at Washington, D. C., as follows:

"'Dahlgren swears he did not sign his deposition taken September, 1872, before Sisson, about La Abra claim, but signed a blank sheet of paper. Sisson swears that Dahlgren signed said deposition when fully written out, and that it was read to Dahlgren by Peña in your presence, and you tied it up. Which is the truth? Wire at our expense.

"'SHELLABARGER & WILSON.

"'Via Galveston, February 23, 1889, dated Mazatlan, 23.

"'SHELLABARGER, R. J. WILSON, Wash'n, D. C.:

"'Sisson is correct. Dahlgren signed deposition when fully written out.

"'D. DANGLADA.'"

"It is admitted by the counsel for Mexico that if D. Danglada were here he would swear that he received the telegram above copied and made the answer above copied and would swear that—

"'Sisson is correct. Dahlgren signed deposition when fully written out.'"

Dahlgren's disposition to repudiate everything in his deposition has already been noticed. Although he had sworn that the original draft or "rough notes" comprised "a dozen or two dozen sheets," and that the examination was prolonged and tedious, he scarcely left enough of his deposition in his testimony before the subcommittee to fill a single sheet. He tried to dispute even the most trivial things in his deposition. One illustration of this has already been given; another is furnished below which also shows his shiftiness, his readiness to swear to two conflicting facts (ibid., p. 704):

"Q. You have testified as one of the evidences that this is not your deposition——

"A. Yes.

"Q. Hold on a minute now—that you did not say your family was going to New York as recorded in this deposition; that you said your family was going to San Francisco. Now, I want you to say whether, in the light of what you have just stated, you can swear that you did not say that your family was going to New York as it is recorded in this deposition?

"A. I have told you that I did not attach any importance. I said they were going to San Francisco. I did not say where else they were going.

"Q. I beg your pardon——

"A. Well, that is what I say now.

"Q. Well, I am not talking about what you are saying.

"A. It is an immaterial question.

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. No, it is not immaterial. It is what you said then. Did you say to that man who took down your deposition that your family were going to New York or going to San Francisco?

"A. Well, after an interval of eighteen years, about, I don't know what I did say, only that I was going to send them to San Francisco first.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, that ought to be satisfactory.

"By Mr. WILSON:

"Q. No; one moment further. You have sworn here before the committee, and pointed out as one of the evidences that this deposition is not correct, that they recorded it here that you said that your family was going to New York.

"A. Well, I did say San Francisco to Gen. Adams.

"Q. Now you swear to that?

"A. Yes; I swear to that now."

Being asked how he happened to sign that sheet of paper half-way up, he said (ibid., p. 700):

"I do not know that.

"Q. Why not at the bottom as well as half-way up the sheet?

"A. That never occurred to me."

But a reason occurring to him just then why it might be prudent to sign a blank sheet for such a purpose near the middle, he continued as follows, without a break:

"I signed it right there in the middle of the sheet or wherever it is. I do not think I have seen that paper since I put my name on it. I will tell why I did that. I did so, thinking that upon this they could put in the certificate of the consul. I knew that something was to be added to it, and signed it up so as to give them room."

He testified in his original deposition that in 1871 he removed certain parts of machinery, which the company had abandoned at Tayoltita, to San Dimas, and used them in the mill belonging to the Durango Company, of which he was superintendent; and in his deposition he claimed to have done this with the sanction of the court (ibid., pp. 402, 403). In his testimony before the subcommittee (ibid., p. 685) he said that the judge declined to give him permission to take these pieces, and that Granger told him (ibid., p. 689) that if the judge would not allow him to take the machinery it would be all right—he (Granger) would allow him, and under that promise he (Dahlgren) took the machinery.

Further examined in regard to this appropriation of property that did not belong to him, he testified (ibid., p. 709):

"Q. You had taken a part of this La Abra Company property from that place?

"A. Yes, I had.

"Q. Will you tell us the property you took away?

"A. I took a water-wheel 24 feet in diameter and, I think, 6 feet breast.

"Q. What else did you take away?

"A. I took some retorts.

"Q. How many?

"A. Two.

"Q. What else did you take away?

"A. I took all such machinery as I needed. I can not recollect the pieces, but I took everything I needed to complete my mill at San Dimas.

"Q. In other words, you dismantled this mill for the purpose of building up your own?

"A. I did.

"Q. From whom did you buy that?

"A. Santiago Granger."

He was further examined on this transaction (ibid., p. 733):

"Q. From whom did you purchase this La Abra property that you took away from there?

"A. I took it.

"Q. Just went and took it?

"A. I took it; yes.

"Q. Did not buy it from anybody?

"A. I paid no money for it, sir.

"Q. By what authority did you take it?

"A. I applied to Judge Quiros for permission to take it, and he denied me, and Granger said: 'If he does deny you, I will allow you to go over and take it;' and I did go over and take it, and that is what I did.

"Q. You just went there and carried away property that did not belong to you?

"A. No, sir; I had permission from Granger to do it.

"Q. Where was Granger at the time?

"A. In my employ as bookkeeper.

At this juncture, for some reason, Dahlgren thought it was important to conceal the fact that Granger had been in the employment of the Durango Company at San Dimas prior to Dahlgren's arrival at that place. It had been developed that Dahlgren had been dealing with a man in his own employ for property which that man did not own, and that under a pretended permission from him, and without paying him or anybody anything for it, and notwithstanding the refusal of the judge to sanction his proceeding, Dahlgren had plundered the works. Granger claimed that he had been left in charge of the property by Exall in March, 1868, but he had left Tayoltita and entered the employ of Ralph Martin, Dahlgren's predecessor at San Dimas, as bookkeeper. But Dahlgren did not want it to appear that when he arrived at San Dimas in July, 1870, Granger was already bookkeeper for the Durango Company. And in his cross-examination, having forgotten what he had previously said on this point, he dodged and prevaricated as follows:

"By Mr. WILSON:

"Q. You found him at San Dimas when you went there?

"A. Yes.

"Q. And do you know in whose employ he was when you went there?

"A. I only know from hearsay.

"Q. Well, was he in th e employ of your company?

"A. I do not know.

"Q. Was he at work in the office of your company?
"A. I could not tell that.
"Q. When you went there?
"A. When I went there I found him there.
"Q. What was he doing?
"A. I do not know.
"Q. Was he keeping the books of the Durango Company?
"A. No, sir; not that I know.
"Q. Well, what was he doing?
"A. I told you I did not know.
"Q. Well, how soon did you take him into your employ? You found him there?
"A. Immediately upon my arrival.
"Q. Did you change his employment in any way?
"A. No, sir; I did not. It was over three months after I was there that I took him in my employ.
"Q. Well, he was there working for the Durango Company, was not he?
"A. I do not know.
"Q. Who was keeping the books of the company when you went there?
"A. I could not say that; I did not know.
"Q. Well, who kept the books of the company during the first three months after you went there?
"A. Ralph Martin. I was there three months with my predecessor before he left.
"Q. And Ralph Martin was your predecessor?
"A. Yes.
"Q. And who kept the books for Ralph Martin?
"A. He kept his own books, and I kept my own books. We started in to wind up the business. It took him three months to wind up, and I started in with my own expenditures.
"Q. Well, I want to know whether Granger was doing anything for that company when he went there?
"A. I do not know, I tell you most distinctly.
"Q. Did you see him there?
"A. I did see him there.
"Q. Was he about the hacienda all the time?
"A. No, sir.
"Q Where was he?
"A. Sometimes in town; sometimes in Tayoltita. When he was out of the hacienda I did not know where he was.
"Q. But after you had been there three months you put him in as bookkeeper?
"A. Yes; I took him in.
"Q. And after he had been in your employ about a year, when Quiros had refused you the right to take that property, you got your authority from your employé, Granger, and you went over and carried it away?
"A. Yes.
"Q. And that is the way you got possession of it?
"A. Yes."

Now, it will scarcely be credited after reading the foregoing that the following is to be found in Dahlgren's direct examination (ibid., 679):

"Q. When did you first become acquainted with James Granger?
"A. When I first reached San Dimas, in July, 1870.
"Q. What was Granger's occupation at that time?
"A. He had been bookkeeper for my predecessor, Ralph Martin, and I retained him in that position during the five years and two months that I was there."

A more complete contradiction of all his prevarications on that point could scarcely be put into a shorter sentence.

In his motion before the umpire for a new hearing, Señor Avila, the Mexican agent in attendance upon the Joint Commission, alluded to Dahlgren's conduct, as disclosed in his deposition, in stripping the mill at Tayoltita, as follows (Ex. Doc. No. 103, H. R., Forty-eighth Congress, first session, p. 94):

"Deponent says that in the enterprise of which he is superintendent, the only American one that has escaped the fury of the Mexican authorities, he availed himself of the opportunity by purchasing a part of the property at mere nominal prices from private individuals, in the acquisition of which he was sustained by the judge of the first instance of San Dimas, according to a contract.

"Here, then, we have the son of an admiral and (himself) consul taking advantage of robberies, but sustaining the claim to which robbers serve as a cover. If a person who acts in this manner is a reputable witness, the undersigned must then candidly confess that he does not understand the meaning of the word."

What Señor Avila would have said of Dahlgren's conduct if, instead of claiming, as he did in his deposition, that he was authorized by the court to take the machinery, he had testified, as he did before the subcommittee, that he took it notwithstanding the refusal of the court to grant him permission, can readily be imagined.

Before the subcommittee Dahlgren denied that he had said in his deposition, in answer to the question how his company could remain at San Dimas without disturbance, that they had had disturbances and difficulties, and had been obliged to submit to all exactions, whether lawful or unlawful, but had found out how to manage and interest them, otherwise they would have been compelled to leave like the others without a doubt. That Dahlgren did make such a statement in his deposition and that it was true is made probable by the testimony of his predecessor as superintendent of the company's mines at San Dimas, Ralph Martin, an unimpeached witness, whose deposition on behalf of the company was taken in New York before United States Commissioner Stilwell in June, 1874. On this point Mr. Martin said (Appendix, p. 470):

"There was, in reality, no protection given to foreigners in the country, and I never knew any effort to be made by the authorities there to extend protection to Americans who were at variance with Mexicans, excepting only in cases where the profits of the mining enterprise were shared by said authorities."

Many more instances of Dahlgren's untrustworthiness could be cited from his testimony before the subcommittee, but another must suffice. It was claimed by counsel for the Mexican Government that certain statements contained in Dahlgren's deposition could not have been made by him, because the facts stated were not within his knowledge; for example, that when he was examined at Mazatlan, on the 18th of September, 1872, he did not know the names of the company's mines, and therefore could not have mentioned them. When Mr. Foster was examining Dahlgren upon the questions and answers in his deposition seriatim, his attention was drawn to the fourth question and answer, reading as follows (ibid., p. 651):

"Q. Where are said mines and property situated; and of what did said improvements of claimant consist, and in what condition are they now?

"A. The principle mines of 'La Abra Silver Mining Company' are in 'La Abra' Mountain, near Tayoltita, in said district of San Dimas. Their names are 'El Rosario,' 'El Cristo,' 'La Abra,' 'La Talpa,' 'El Arrayan,' 'El Sauce,' and some others in that district whose names I have forgotten."

Then his examination was thus continued:

"Q. Is that a correct answer to the question as you gave it?

"A. No, sir; because I didn't know what mines they possessed.

"Q. Did you ever know, by name, the mines whose names are here given? Did you ever know whether or not they belonged to La Abra Company?

"A. No, sir; I knew that La Abra mine belonged to the company. I had been at El Arrayan, but I didn't know the names of the rest of the mines belonging to the company.

"Q. And you did not attempt to give the names in that examination?

"A. No, sir; nor their condition."

But subsequently, in his reply to a question whether he had testified in his deposition "to anything as to the denouncement of the Rosario mine by Granger" (ibid., p. 653), he replied: "I believe I did." That made three of the company's mines whose names he knew prior to his examination at Mazatlan—"La Abra," "Arrayan," and "Rosario." Further on, his attention was again directed to the names and value of the company's mines, as stated in his deposition, "more particularly to 'La Abra,' 'El Rosario,' 'La Talpa,' and 'El Cristo' veins, and to a remark of his in his said deposition that he 'should like to own them, and if it were possible to raise capital to work them.'" Whereupon, forgetting that he had said a short time before that he did not know their names, he replied that he could have owned them if he had wanted to, and that he had the means to work them, and then to show how familiar he was with the company's mines, and in what a practical manner, he added (ibid., p. 659):

"Some people repeatedly asked me to go over there and take hold of those mines, but I always declined.

"Q. Why did you decline?

"A. Because I sent over my right-hand man to look over the district and if there was anything good to secure it.

"My rule always is to send out my right-hand man to look at a property first, and then if he reports favorably on it I go myself and look at it, and if it is good I take it."

But without this evidence that he had received a report on the company's mines there would be a strong probability supporting his deposition that he knew their names, and in a general way their location and characteristics; for during more than two years prior to his examination at Mazatlan he had been associated intimately with James Granger, who knew all about the mines, and Gen. Adams had been his guest at San Dimas, and had there made examinations of witnesses preliminary to taking their depositions in court. And Dahlgren testified that he "heard the case talked of pro and con in his hacienda" (ibid., p. 670):

"We would sit there of an evening and talk of it."

He had been at San Dimas over two years, and his "right-hand man" had made a report on the company's mines before he made his deposition at Mazatlan in September, 1872.

Besides, in referring to his book on the "Historic Mines in Mexico," in which the company's mines "La Abra," "Rosario," "La Luz," and "El Christo," are mentioned, he said to the subcommittee (ibid., p. 687):

"I have always kept carefully a mining diary, and as I got information about mines I placed it down, tabulated it, and kept it. During the five years I was in Mexico I did that, and finally I got such a mass of data I put it into shape."

It is also to be remarked that in speaking of his frequent visits to the company's hacienda in October, November, and December of 1871, when he was helping himself to the machinery, he said (ibid., p. 685) that nobody at that time was occupying the company's mines. In the earlier part of his examination before the subcommittee (ibid., top of p. 652) he said that he did not know "anything whatever of the mines that La Abra Company abandoned," alluding to the time when he made his deposition at Mazatlan, but it afterwards appeared, as already observed, from a memorandum in his notebook, that two months before he was examined at Mazatlan, he had made a personal examination of "El Arrayan." It also appeared that he knew his bookkeeper had denounced "El Rosario," and that he (Dahlgren) was intimate with Francisco Torres (ibid., p. 686), who worked that mine and "La Luz" in partnership with Granger in 1870 or 1871.

The testimony of ex-Consul Sisson or Domingo Danglada was not necessary to prove that Dahlgren committed perjury in maintaining, as he did before the subcommittee, the truth of his letter to Lines in regard to the manner in which his deposition was taken at Mazatlan. It does not appear that his deposition could ever have been of much importance in the case, so far as the award was concerned, for he did not arrive at San Dimas until July, 1870, more than two years after La Abra Company had abandoned its property, and the great bulk of his deposition was hearsay.

It is true that he vouched again and again in the strongest terms for the honesty, intelligence, courage, and truthfulness of his Mexican "mozo," Avalos, whose three depositions, two taken on behalf of the company, and one alleged to have been taken by a Mexican judge in court on behalf of the Mexican Government, are printed in the appendix, and have been already noticed in this report. But Dahlgren's deposition takes its chief importance from the fact that he denied having made it in the form in which it was submitted to the Joint Commission, and that his denial, coupled with his aspersion upon Gen. Adams, was made so prominent in the so-called "new evidence offered by Mexico" so early in the efforts of that Government, through Gen. Slaughter and his subagents, to impeach the award.

The testimony of ex-Consul Sisson and of Domingo Danglada, with Dahlgren's own contradictions and inconsistencies, have destroyed his credibility and relieved Gen. Adams and the company from any discredit or stigma cast upon them by Dahlgren's letter. That Dahlgren's letter was injurious to Gen. Adams and, reflexively, to the company, is beyond dispute; for in an earlier report by Mr. Edmunds for Mr. Morgan, from the Committee on Foreign Relations (July 7, 1886), it is said that the evidence submitted by the Mexican Government in the document entitled "Claims against Mexico" shows that some of the testimony offered by the company to establish its claim before the Commission was forged by its agent and attorney, Adams.

The reference in that report is to Dahlgren's letter, which was printed therein with the following caption in italics: "Letter from C. B. Dahlgren to Mr. Robert B. Lines, stating that his deposition in favor of La Abra Silver Mining Company has been forged." This charge will now have to be withdrawn with the other charges falsely accusing Gen. Adams of having been short in his accounts as captain and assistant commissary at the close of the Mexican war, and of having been thrice court-martialed (and, inferentially, disgraced) during his service in the United States Army in the war for the Union.

One of the most remarkable and satisfactory features of the recent investigation was the formal withdrawal of the charges against Gen. Adams, affecting his military record, by one of the counsel for the Mexican Government (Mr. Lines) in the course of his cross-examination. The official documents showing the falsity of the charges reflecting on the personal integrity of Gen. Adams were received in evidence and are printed, with the testimony of Mr. Lines on the subject, on pages 931-934 of the appendix.

It seems to the undersigned that the testimony taken before the subcommittee instead of impeaching the award has shown the strong foundations upon which it rests and has justfied the wisdom and equity of the umpire.

The Mexican Government has shown by Col. De Lagnel in this recent investigation how general and deep-seated were the suspicion and hatred of the United States and its citizens among the population in the vicinity of the mines when he was the company's superintendent in the year 1867; how "pernicious" and dangerous was the character of the local justice of the peace who had established himself on the company's property; on what slight occasion an armed "demonstration" was made against the superintendent and his American employés at the hacienda; how the same thing happened at San Dimas, and how unfounded is the theory of the minority report that events of importance which were not mentioned in the company's letter-press copy book are not to be credited, although the superintendent testifies to them under oath.

The Mexican Government in this recent investigation has shown by Francisco Torres that of all the ores abandoned by the company in March, 1868—from 10,000 to 14,000 cargas—only 500 or 600 cargas remained two or three years after the abandonment, and it need hardly be said that if the ore had been poor it would not have been carried away. The Mexican Government in this recent investigation has shown by Somero and Hermosillo that, in the estimation of one of the most experienced and competent miners in Mexico, La Abra mine is still so rich in undeveloped resources that during the last seven or eight years he has been engaged in tunneling the property—an extensive and systematic operation not yet completed—at a cost of from $50,000 to $60,000.

The Mexican Government in this recent investigation has shown by A. B. Elder that one of the most infamous charges it ever made against the company was utterly without foundation or color of excuse; and also that no protection was afforded by the local authorities to the witness himself when the richest of his ores were stolen at La Puerta in 1865, and that it would have been dangerous both for him and the local magistrate if the latter had attempted to enforce the law. The Mexican Government has also put itself under a cloud of suspicion by the testimony of the same witness, and of the "contractor," Gen. James E. Slaughter, and of the detective, Fisher, in regard to the propriety and integrity of the methods it has pursued in its attempts to reopen the award. Instead of showing, as it set out to show in the recent investigation, that the award should be reopened and the claim readjudicated on the merits, the Mexican Government has shown that the ancient maxim which the House committee, in Mr. DANIEL'S report, has applied to this case, should be so applied without further evasion or delay: It is to the interest of the commonwealth that litigation should cease.

Legal objections to the bill.

The bill (S. 2632) authorizes and directs the Attorney-General of the United States "to bring a suit or suits in the name of the United States in the Court of Claims against La Abra Silver Mining Company, its successors and assigns, and all persons making any claim to the award, or any part thereof, in this act mentioned, to determine whether the award made by the United States and Mexican Mixed Commission in respect to the claim of the said La Abra Silver Mining Company was obtained, as to the whole sum included therein or as to any part thereof, by fraud or false swearing, or other false and fraudulent practices on the part of the said La Abra Silver Mining Company, or its agents, attorneys, or assigns;" and undertakes to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims "to hear and determine such suit, and to make all interlocutory and final decrees therein as the evidence may warrant, according to the principles of equity and justice, and to enforce the same by injunction or any proper final process, and in all respects to proceed in said cause according to law and the rules of said court so far as the same are applicable." The bill also grants an appeal to either party from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, and undertakes to confer jurisdiction upon that court to decide such appeal.

It is provided in the fourth section of the bill "that in case it should be finally adjudged in said cause that the award made by said Mixed Commission, so far as it relates to the claim of La Abra Silver Mining Company, was based upon or obtained through fraud or false swearing, or other false and fraudulent practices of said company, or its assigns, or by their procurement, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to release the Government of Mexico from the further payment thereof to the extent that the same is so declared fraudulent, and to return to said Government any money paid by the Government of Mexico on account of said award remaining in the custody of the United States that has not been heretofore distributed to said La Abra Silver Mining Company, or its successors and assigns, which such court shall decide that such persons are not entitled, in justice and equity, to receive out of said fund."

The fifth section of the bill declares that it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of State, during the pendency of said suit and until the same is decided, to make any further payments out of said fund on account of said award, and that in case said court shall decide in said suit that said La Abra Silver Mining Company, or its successors and assigns, are in justice and equity entitled to any part of said award that shall remain to be paid or distributed, the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute the same to the persons entitled thereto.

Nature of the question which the bill proposes to submit to the Court of Claims.

Is the question which it is thus proposed to submit to the Court of Claims, and on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States for decision, judicial and justiciable or political or diplomatic in its nature? The question simply stated is whether an award rendered under such a treaty as that of July 4, 1868, between Mexico and the United States, by a Mixed Commission, should be opened on account of allegations of fraud in the procurement of the proofs upon which it is founded. Or, in other words, whether the United States, so far as this particular award is concerned, should in comity and justice release Mexico from its solemn engagement (in the language of the treaty) "to consider the result of the proceedings of this Commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of every claim." What department under our form of government has the power to make a final answer to that question whether Mexico should be released from her engagement in this case or not?

Is that power lodged in the Executive or the judiciary; or can it be exercised by either? Perhaps an exact definition of the thing done and the authority exercised in rendering the award will be of assistance in answering the question. In rendering the award it was determined that the Mexican Government should pay to the Government of the United States, for the benefit of La Abra Company, a certain sum of money. This determination was not the act of either Government alone. The Commission was the creature of both Governments; the umpire was the chosen agent of both Governments acting through their respective Commissioners who chose him.

The particular thing that was ascertained and determined in the Abra award was ascertained and determined by the two Governments acting conjointly by virtue of and in accordance with the treaty. The judgment rendered—the coin issued from this international mint bears the stamp of both Republics. An award may be the fruit of a treaty, and it may be provided in that treaty that the award shall be final, and yet the award may not have an international character. The ascertainment of what amount is due to A or B may be made by a purely domestic agency, as in the cases of the Chinese claims under the treaty of 1858, or the Mexican claims that were decided under the treaty of February 2, 1848 (Guadalupe Hidalgo), both of which treaties left the ascertainment and determination of the amount of the particular claims to the United States acting exclusively by its own agents. Article 15 of the aforesaid treaty with Mexico contained the following provisions:

"The United States, exonerating Mexico from all demands on account of the claims of their citizens mentioned in the preceding article, and considering them entirely and forever canceled, whatever their amount may be, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding three and one quarter millions of dollars. To ascertain the validity and amount of those claims, a board of commissioners shall be established by the Government of the United States."

The award to Gardiner by the Commission appointed under that treaty was a purely domestic act. The Government of the United States had a direct pecuniary interest in that award; the Mexican Government had none. It was not only the right of the Government of the United States, but a duty it owed to all its citizens, to refuse to pay that award on proof that it was obtained by corruption, and it was in the courts and the courts only that the Government could enforce its rights and obtain justice against the wrongdoer after the award was rendered. The wrongdoer was first indicted for perjury and then was made defendant in a civil suit to annul the award for fraud. It has been already observed that Mexico was not represented in the tribunal by which that award or the Atocha award was rendered, and that these awards were not stamped with the international character which distinguishes La Abra award. They were the work of a purely domestic agency, and founded entirely on ex parte proofs. No evidence whatever was taken in opposition to the claims.

The report of the majority of the committee and the citation in that report from the views of counsel for the Mexican Government overlook this vital distinction. Neither the committee nor counsel mention a single instance of the submission of an award of a mixed or international tribunal to a domestic court of either of the high contracting parties for review. An international award—an ascertainment and determination of a particular claim by a mixed commission—can be reviewed, but it can be reviewed only by the concurrent action of the two sovereign powers who were parties to it. The question whether such an award ought to be reviewed is a question for the two nations communicating with each other through their constitutional organs of communication; in other words, the question is diplomatic and not judicial.

This was the conclusion reached in June, 1880, by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in reporting against the passage of a bill authorizing the Court of Claims to investigate this same La Abra case. The committee, consisting of Allen G. Thurman, chairman; Joseph E. McDonald, Thomas F. Bayard, A. H. Garland, L. Q. C. Lamar, David Davis, George F. Edmunds, Roscoe Conkling, and Matt. H. Carpenter, held (Report No. 712, Sen., 46th Cong., 2d sess.)—

"That this would involve an investigation by Congress of facts of an international character, which, in the opinion of the committee, properly belong to the executive department, and which it was the intention of the fifth section of the act of June 18, 1878, to leave with the department.

"The bill under consideration proposes to withdraw these two claims from the dominion of international jurisdiction, and place them before a tribunal organized and existing solely by virtue of the laws of this country, and in this way it would seem designed to avoid the opening up of other questions of complaints that are known to exist on behalf of citizens of the United States, whose claims, for various causes, failed to receive favorable consideration by said Commission under the treaty creating the Commission.

"The second article of that treaty bound the two Governments absolutely and conclusively by the final awards of the Commission and umpire in all cases coming within its provisions, and it would seem right that if it is to be set aside as to any of the claims it ought to be by a new convention in which provision should be made to do justice to all claims."

The constitutional inability of Congress to make justiciable what is not justiciable, or to withdraw from the judiciary what is justiciable, is expressed by Mr. Justice Curtis in rendering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Den vs. The Hoboken Land Improvement Company (18 How., 285), as follows:

"To avoid misconstruction upon so grave a subject, we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any mattter which from its nature is the subject of a suit at the common law, or in equity or admiralty; nor, on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination."

This point will be found presented more at large, with the authorities, in some extracts from a brief of Messrs. Shellabarger & Wilson, of counsel for the company, which will be printed in an appendix to this report.

The bill would encroach on the power of the President to distribute the funds, and would revive in the courts a controversy that has been settled between the two nations.

It is assumed in the majority report that the President's power to lawfully withhold distribution of the funds received from Mexico in payment of these awards comes from Congress by virtue of the act of June 18, 1878, and that he has no authority to distribute these funds because of an alleged reservation of the control of their distribution on the part of Congress, indicated by the words "until Congress shall otherwise direct," which are to be found in that act; and the majority report intimates that this view is supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Frelinghuysen vs. The United States (110 U. S., 63).

The question involved in that case was whether the President had any right to withhold the funds paid in by Mexico from any of the awardees—whether he had discretion in the premises or a merely ministerial duty to discharge. This was the only question before the court, but in deciding that question the court was obliged to consider certain other questions upon which the decision of that particular question depended. The act of June 18, 1878, was carefully considered by the court, because it was relied upon by the counsel for the Government as a justification for the refusal of the Secretary of State to distribute the funds which he had received from the Government of Mexico on account of the Weil and La Abra awards.

Why legislation was necessary to carry the treaty of July 4, 1868, into effect.

It appears from a letter addressed by Mr. Evarts, while Secretary of State, on the 6th of November, 1877, to Mr. Swann, who was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, that no action on the part of Congress was considered necessary to authorize the President to distribute the funds that had been and were thereafter to be received from Mexico under the treaty of July 4, 1868. Such distribution, Mr. Evarts said, "would be according to the practice of the Government," but some legislation was necessary to make good to the fund the amount with which the Government of the United States was charged, i. e., the sum total of all the awards which had been rendered by the Mixed Commission in favor of citizens of Mexico against the United States, and which under the treaty had been deducted from the sum total of awards in favor of citizens of the United States against Mexico.

So we find the act of June 18, 1878, appropriating the amount reserved by the Mexican Government, and also authorizing the Secretary of State to deduct from the payments received and to be received from Mexico a sum not to exceed 5 per cent thereof until the aggregate of the amount so deducted should equal the sum of $114,948.74, being the amount of the expenses of the Commission. Mexico having deducted and reserved the amount awarded to her own citizens from the sum total awarded against her in favor of our citizens (who thus, as it were, paid a debt due by their Government to the Government of Mexico), Congress proceeded to "make good to the fund" the amount so reserved, in order that there might be a sum sufficient in the hands of the Secretary of State, with the installments paid to him by the Mexican Government, to pay the amounts awarded to our citizens by the Joint Commission.

The act of June 18, 1878, construed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

It was a portion of the fifth section of the act that the court found it necessary to construe in the case of Frelinghuysen vs. The United States (supra). That portion read as follows:

"SEC. 5. And whereas the Government of Mexico has called the attention of the Government of the United States to the claims hereinafter named with a view to a rehearing; therefore, be it enacted, that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate any charges of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the cases hereinafter named, and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity, require that the awards in the cases of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, or either of them, should be opened and the cases retried, it shall be lawful for him to withhold payment of said awards, or either of them, until such case or cases shall be retried and decided in such manner as the Governments of the United States and Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct."

There is nothing in the opinion of the court, as rendered by the late Chief Justice Waite, to support the idea of the committee that the President takes his power either to distribute or to withhold distribution of the funds in question from Congress; but, on the contrary, the opinion holds that the President, having under the Constitution the initiative in making treaties, may, as the constitutional depository of such treaty-making power, inquire into such charges as those made by the Mexican Government in this case and into the propriety of opening such an award with a view of providing for a retrial of the claim by a treaty. "In our opinion," says the Chief Justice, "it would have been just as competent for President Hayes to institute the same inquiry without this request as with it"—alluding to the act in question—"and his action, with the statute in force, is no more binding on his successor than it would have been without." The court seemed anxious to avoid the idea that in a matter of this sort Congress would undertake to give any direction to the President. This appears from the following passage:

"The first section of the act of 1878 authorizes and requires the Secretary of State to receive the moneys paid by Mexico under the convention, and to distribute them among the several claimants, but it manifests no disposition on the part of Congress to encroach on the power of the President and Senate to conclude another treaty with Mexico in respect to any or even all the claims allowed by the Commission, if in their opinion the honor of the United States should demand it."

The court does not tolerate the idea, although there are some expressions in the act which seem to point that way, that Congress intended to direct the President either to distribute or not to distribute these funds, or to investigate or not to investigate Mexico's charges against these awards. "The fifth section, as we construe it," said the Chief Justice, "is nothing more than an expression by Congress, in a formal way, of its desire that the President will, before he makes any payment on the Weil or La Abra claims, investigate the charges of fraud presented by Mexico, 'and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity, require that the awards * * * or either of them should be opened and the cases retried,' that he will 'withhold payment * * * until the case or cases shall be retried and decided in such manner as the Governments of the United States and of Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct.'"

The court here has quoted the very words from the act which seem to reserve some power on the part of Congress to "direct" a distribution of the funds in those particular cases at some future time, and the court has said of the 5th section of the act including those words, that it "is nothing more than an expression by Congress, in a formal way, of its desire," etc. Speaking of the act, the Chief Justice says:

"From the beginning to the end it is, in form even, only a request from Congress."

The words, "or until Congress shall otherwise direct," evidently refer to the withholding of payment, and not, as has been maintained on the Mexican side, to any alternative method of retrying the Weil or La Abra claims—not, as has been argued, to some domestic instead of the international proceeding pointed out by the words of the act, namely, "in such manner as the Governments of the United States and Mexico may agree." This is shown by the repetition of the word "until." The words, "it shall be lawful for the President to withhold payment until" an agreement for a retrial shall be made between the two Governments, or "until Congress shall otherwise direct," were not intended to be imperative, and could not be so construed without involving an encroachment by Congress upon the province of the Executive.

The court distinctly held that such withholding was in the President's discretion, without any authority from Congress—as completely without the statute as with it; that of his own motion he could negotiate with Mexico for a new trial of any or all of the claims, and, while so negotiating, and until the two Governments ceased to negotiate, he could withhold the funds from the persons in whose favor awards had been rendered. In the following passages from the late Chief Justice's opinion the court has made its meaning and the scope of its decision clear beyond question:

"From the statements in the answer of Secretary Frelinghuysen in the Key case it appears that further evidence has been found, and that President Arthur, upon this and what was before President Hayes, has become satisfied that the contested decisions should be opened and the claims retried. Consequently, the President, believing that the honor of the United States demands it, has negotiated a new treaty, providing for such a reëxamination of the claim, and submitted it to the Senate for ratification. Under these circumstances it is, in our opinion, clearly within the discretion of the President to withhold all further payments to the relators until the diplomatic negotiations between the two Governments on the subject are finally concluded. That discretion of the executive department of the Government can not be controlled by the judiciary.

"All we decide is, that it was within the discretion of the President to negotiate again with Mexico in respect to the claims, and that, as long as the two Governments are treating on the questions involved, he may properly withhold from the relators their distributive shares of the money now in the hands of the Secretary of State."

The decision of the Supreme Court is therefore directly opposed to the views expressed in the majority report in regard to the source and extent of the President's power to withhold or to make distribution of the funds received from Mexico on account of La Abra award.

APPENDIX.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL S. 2632.

The bill is an attempt at special legislation in this, that it would change the rules of law governing the opening of judgments and the granting of new trials.

[Extracts from a brief submitted by Messrs. Shellabarger & Wilson, of counsel for La Abra Company, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed for its use, May 2, 1888.]

The proposed suit, as defined by the pending bill, is one which proposes to supply Mexico, in her attack upon this award, with rules of law, in aid of her attack, that are not afforded to any other suitor in any other case, either in England, or this country, or any civilized nation.

In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, pages 391 and 392, and in note 2, the salutary rule of law upon this subject is thus stated:

"On principle, it can never be within the bounds of legitimate legislation to enact a special law, or to pass a resolve dispensing with the general law in a particular case, and granting a privilege and indulgence to one man by way of exemption from the operation and effect of such general law, and leaving all other persons under its operation.

"Such a law is neither just nor reasonable in its consequences. It is our boast that we live under a government of laws and not of men; but this can hardly be deemed a blessing unless those laws have for their immovable basis the great principle of constitutional equality. Can it be supposed for a moment that, if the Legislature should pass a general law, and add a section, by way of proviso, that it should never be construed to have any operation or effect upon the persons, rights, or property of Archelaus Lewis or John Gordon [in this case La Abra], such a proviso would receive the sanction or even the countenance of a court of laws?"

This special aid and favor, establishing rules of trial and adjudication in favor of Mexico and against the American citizens, which this bill proposes, but which is denied to all other litigants, is this: It is perfectly settled law, as laid down in The United States vs. Throckmorton (98 U. S. R., 61), and in effect repeated in 101 U. S. R., 947; 111 U. S. R., 520, and 112 U. S. R., 32) that no fraud will set aside a judgment or award, except (to here quote the words of the Supreme Court) "those which are extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried, and not a fraud which was in issue in the former case."

It has been claimed that this rule of evidence asserted in Throckmorton's case (98 U. S. R., 61; also in 101 U. S. R., 477; 111 U. S. R., 520, and 112 U. S. R., 32) has been in some way qualified or overruled in Minor against The United States (114 U. S. R., 233). This is an utter mistake, and the law of Throckmorton's case (supra) is as firmly fixed as any principle of our law. This case of Minor's reaffirms, adheres to, and repeats the law as above cited from Throckmorton (see this in 114 U. S. R., 241 and 242). And Minor's case simply holds that, in an ex parte proceeding before the land officers, where there is no adversary element in the case, where witnesses are not examined and cross-examined, but everything is on one side, and a fraud is thus perpetrated in securing a patent, there the principles of the Throckmorton case do not apply.

But we submit that it is too late in the history of international awards for any one, even though having the reckless courage of Mexico, to assert that an international trial, secured through an international treaty, where the commissioners are sworn as quasi judges, where testimony is taken upon examination and cross-examination, and where the right for both sides to appear by counsel is secured, as is done by the second article of the treaty under which this award was made (see treaty of July 4, 1868, volume Public Treaties of the United States, 510), and where the treaty makes the decision of the commissioners or umpire "absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided," is a mere ex parte and nonjudicial proceeding, like the one described by Justice Miller (on p. 240, 114 U. S.) in Minor's case.

The treaty itself makes the trial strictly one inter partes and adversary; and the testimony taken in this one case of La Abra, upon examination and cross-examination (and which has been printed in book form and was presented to committees of Congress and is now accessible to the Senate committee), forms an immense mass, the mere printing of which cost the claimant about $1,500. And as to the decision reached in the case being a judgment of an international court the law is equally settled. On this point the language of the Supreme Court, in the most elaborately considered case regarding such an award ever decided by that court, is that "their" (the commissioners') "decision within the scope of their authority is conclusive and final" (Comegys et al. vs. Vasse, 1 Peters, 212).

In Judson vs. Corcoran (17 How., 612) the same court decides that these international trials are so thoroughly adversary and judicial in their nature as that they pass the legal title to estates decreed or adjudged thereby.

The finality of such judgments as these is again repeated in the case of Key vs. Frelinghuysen (110 U. S., 72).

Observe that, so far as the point of finality is concerned, it is here alluded to not for the purpose of showing that a treaty can not set aside this award, but simply for the purpose of establishing the grade, or rank, or class, or dignity to which these decisions belong; that they are not ex parte, as was the decision in Minor's case, but are preëminently adversary, and judicial, and final.

But this present bill carefully, and on purpose, proposes to ignore and abolish this rule, and not only to retry the question of alleged fraud, which was in issue before, and was tried by the commissioners and by the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, but it proposes to overthrow that award either in whole or, at least, in part, provided any part of it was influenced in its procurement by, not perjury, but any "false swearing" (see sec. 1 and sec. 4). So that the effect of this bill is, first, to supply, in the United States, a champion to fight Mexico's battles and pay her expenses; and then it proposes to set aside this award, if its procurement was in any degree produced by "false," though perfectly honest, opinions, regarding value, or the like. And the committee will never forget that it is not pretended, and never will be, that the time given to Mexico, by the United States, for procuring evidence of said alleged fraud (more than five years, during which the Commission was in session) was not ample, or that the trial was not perfectly fair and entirely free from any "extrinsic fraud," preventing or tending to prevent a fair trial of the issues.

The bill would set the award aside for an alleged exaggeration of damages, which the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in the Forty-ninth Congress found to be not proved by Mexico's so-called "new evidence."

Our next point is that this bill proposes to set aside the award, not upon the ground that this property of the American claimant was not taken by Mexico, but upon the ground that the damages were exaggerated.

The utmost that was asserted by Mr. Evarts, in the statement which is in part quoted in the first "whereas" of this bill, was that there was evidence tending to show that the damages were "exaggerated," and only exaggerated. And we are glad, on this point, to be able now to state that, in his last official communication on the subject to the President, the present Secretary of State explicitly adopts and emphatically repeats the conclusion of Mr. Evarts, to wit, that this is only a case of alleged "exaggeration" of damages.

This letter of Secretary Bayard, dated 28th of February, 1888, and found in Executive Document No. 109, Fiftieth Congress, first session, can not, we regret to say, be regarded as friendly to the American side of this controversy; and yet, in this last communication, the Secretary has the justice to state as follows (see page 6):

"Nor can the payment, by Mr. Evarts, of certain installments of La Abra award be regarded as inconsistent with his recommendation of investigation in that case, since the allegations of fraud in relation thereto (La Abra award) affect only the measure of damages, and not, as in the Weil case, the question whether any ground of claim ever existed."

Here, then, confessedly, the only objection to the award is that the damages were too large, and yet on this point, at the last Congress, a committee of the House, after full investigation, finds that the damages are amply justified by proofs which remain unimpeached by Mexico's so-called "new evidence." We quote the words of the majority of the committee, which we confidently submit are fully justified by the testimony, a summary of which will be found cited in the views of the minority, embodied in Senate Report No. 1454, first session Forty-ninth Congress, at page 11 et seq., to which, and to the book of evidence there cited, we beg the attention of the committee.

The finding of the House committee, referred to above, upon this sole question of exaggerated damages, is stated by Mr. DANIEL in his report (No. 3474, H. R., Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 29) as follows:

"But this remains, when all that can be said in favor of the interference proposed has been considered, that there was ample evidence before Sir Edward Thornton, that is not impugned by any new evidence, to have sustained and warranted his award; that the award did not embrace damages on account of the items that have been surcharged or apparently falsified; that that award was far below what was claimed; that it was far below, in amount, the damage which, in the opinion of unimpugned witnesses, the claimant's company suffered; that it did not embrace speculative damages; that the mistreatment of the company, by Mexican officials and people, is proved by their own testimony; and that, conceding all that, by reasonable intendment, the newly discovered evidence proves, the award made had ample foundation in testimony not successfully impeached, and was not in excess of fair compensation for losses suffered, according to that testimony. * * * Mexico had full and fair hearing. The great mass of cases was decided in her favor, and the only maxim which we conceive is now wisely applicable to this claim is that which tells us it is to the interest of the Commonwealth that litigation should cease."

The bill would submit a political question to the courts.

The next point we desire to submit is that the bill in the provision attempting to give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court is clearly unconstitutional, because it is an attempt to submit a political as distinguished from a judicial question to the judgment or decree of the Court of Claims, and, on appeal, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

On this point we wish to, if possible, make the matter plain. Our point is not that the United States can not sue a wrongdoer for the recovery back of moneys fraudulently obtained from the Government. It is abundantly settled that such suit can be maintained. Neither is it our present point that the "finality" given to an international award by treaty is such that the award could not have been attacked by a proper suit, brought by the proper party, and conducted under the known rules of law applicable in such a case. Nor is it our present point that Mexico could not, at the proper time and before her appeal to the proper diplomatic forum, where she has just been defeated, prosecute a suit to determine whether the Abra award, made by the Mixed Commission, was obtained by such fraud as would, on legal principles, overthrow or justify the reopening of the award. But, on the contrary, the present point is this, that the question which the pending bill proposes to submit to the courts for trial is, in substance and legal effect, as to what the President and Secretary of State shall do with the money now in the possession of the Secretary, and hereafter to come into his hands, paid in by Mexico upon the said award.

As to this, keep, now, please, carefully in mind the following preliminary suggestions, bearing upon the present point:

First, that in the paragraph by Mr. Evarts, recited in the first part of the preamble to this bill, it was, by Mr. Evarts, distinctly declared that neither international law, honor, nor equity demanded or permitted a new international trial, such as that named in the fifth section of the act of 1878; and he, in addition, there stated that the investigation which was needed was simply an ex parte investigation by the United States, through its own instrumentalities, for the purpose of ascertaining whether, in fact, the damages had been "exaggerated." The thing, therefore, recommended by Mr. Evarts in the passage quoted in the preamble of the bill, was not at all a suit "at law or in equity," within the sense of these words, as embodied in Article III, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, declaring that "the judicial power' shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the "Constitution," etc.

On the contrary, he had just discarded the right to resort to an international trial inter partes, upon the case as it then stood before him; and the further and more thorough investigation which he suggested, and for the means of making which he said that the Executive was dependent upon Congress, was, as we understand his meaning, not only to be ex parte, but was intended merely to satisfy the conscience of the United States, by removing doubt, and to enable the Executive to determine definitely what further action, if any, might be required. We respectfully submit that this further investigation has now been thoroughly made. No extrajudicial examination could be fairer or more thorough than that which was made by the House committee last session, from whose majority resort, ten to three, we have already quoted. Nor was it ex parte. The Mexican Government was represented by its distinguished and accomplished agent, Mr. Foster, and learned counsel besides; and had every possible advantage at the different sessions in presenting its case, for many matters on its side were considered which would be excluded by the rules of law at a regular trial.

Next carefully observe that the United States does not and never did pretend to have the slightest property interest in this money, and which is requisite to enable it to sue touching the money. Therefore, the suit which is to be prosecuted under this bill is, in its characteristics and objects, a political, as distinguished from a judicial, inquest, precisely like the one recommended in the passage from Mr. Evarts, partly quoted in the preamble to this bill; and is a suit, in its design and general result, simply advisory to our Executive touching its duty regarding this money. And so the bill itself, in certain passages, treats and regards the matter. It does not contemplate or authorize any judgment or decree upon which process of execution or other process to enforce the decree is contemplated or is possible. On the contrary, it provides, in section 4, what the President shall do in the event of a certain finding in favor of Mexico; namely, he shall release Mexico, and return certain moneys paid in. And also provides, in section 5, in case the decision is in favor of La Abra, that the Secretary shall pay La Abra the moneys paid in.

It is thus seen that the lawsuit proposed is one by the United States, in regard to moneys in which it has no property interests whatever, and is simply the conduit through which the money passes on its way from Mexico to the American awardees. It will be also observed that the proposed suit is not in the nature of "a bill of interpleader," filed by a stakeholder, for direction by the court as to what shall be done with the money. This is so because, first, it is not proposed to make Mexico a party to this bill; and because, second, the question (as we shall presently see) which party shall get this money is not a judicial question in its nature, but a political one.

With these preliminaries kept carefully in mind, turn now to the inquiry what the law is as to the possibility of giving the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction to decide, or adjudge, or decree, or advise regarding such political questions. And in answer to this last inquiry notice, first of all, that the question proposed to be submitted to the courts has been finally decided and closed by the action of the treaty-making power in finally rejecting the treaty providing for a new trial. This being so, the action of the political branch of the Government is conclusive upon the courts, and the courts to which it is proposed to send this case for determination can not decide it otherwise than as it has been decided by the treaty-making, or political, branch of the Government.

In order right here to make plain what we mean, take this illustration: Suppose this bill were, in express words (as it is in legal effect), one directing the Court of Claims, and, on appeal, the Supreme Court, to decide whether a new treaty ought to be made, providing, as the one recently rejected did, for a new commission and international trial. Is there anybody that would say that such a question can be submitted to the Supreme Court?

Of course there is not. And yet this is, in effect, precisely what the present bill does, as we have seen. That no such political question, or nonjudicial question, whether political or not, can be sent to the Supreme Court by an act of Congress, is thoroughly settled. On this point turn first to the opinion by Chief Justice Taney, found in Gordon vs. The United States, reported in 2 Wallace, 561, and then to the opinion in that case found in the appendix to 117 United States Report, page 698. There this subject is examined with great fullness. And the pith of the decision is embodied in the following statement, from page 702, 117 United States Report, by the Chief Justice:

"Nor can Congress authorize or require this court to express an opinion on a case where its judicial power could not be exercised, and where its judgment would not be final and conclusive upon the rights of the parties, and process of execution awarded to carry it into effect."

A question in legal principle like this was submitted to Caleb Cushing, as Attorney-General, and was answered in his opinion of November 25, 1855 (7 Opinions, 599), where he decided what is thus expressed in the headnote:

"The question whether the United States will pay, according to their original tenor, drafts drawn by the Mexican Government under the Macilla convention, or suspend payment at the subsequent request of the said Government, is a matter of political and not of legal determination."

The same legal question is decided in scores of cases by the Supreme Court; these holding that the judicial powers and the political powers of the Government must be constantly kept distinct and the one not to encroach upon the other, and that, wherever the political department of the Government has settled a nonjudicial question (as the political department has settled this, by rejecting a treaty providing for a new trial) in a given way, there the judicial department can not overrule or inquire into the wisdom of that decision. This will be found in, amongst others, the following cases:

Luther vs. Borden, 7 How., 1, 11.
White vs. Hart, 13 Wall., 649.
Phillips vs. Paine, 92 U. S., 132, and the cases there cited.
United States vs. Lee, 106 U. S., 209.
The Exchange vs. McFadden, 7 Cranch, 116.
State of Georgia vs. Stanton, 6 Wall., 50.

Even the case of Frelinghuysen vs. Key (110 U. S., 70 et seq.) is one where this doctrine of the want of power, even in "Congress, to 'encroach' upon the power of the President and Senate to conclude another treaty with Mexico," and to determine whether a new international trial ought to be granted, is more than indicated—is in effect asserted.

After stating that the fifth section of the act of 1878 (20 Stats., 144) provided for a certain distribution, the court (p. 74) adds:

"But it manifests no disposition, on the part of Congress, to encroach on the power of the President and the Senate to conclude another treaty with Mexico in respect to any, or even all, the claims allowed by the Commission, if in their opinion the honor of the United States should demand it."

Then, lower down, the court says:

"From the beginning to the end it is, in form even, only a request from Congress to the Executive. This is far from making the President for the time being a quasi judicial tribunal to hear Mexico and the implicated claimants, and determine once for all between them whether the charges which Mexico makes have been judicially established. In our opinion it would have been just as competent for President Hayes to have instituted the same inquiry without this request as with it, and his action with the statute in force is no more binding on his successor than it would have been without."

If this case, therefore, shows, on this aspect of the matter, anything, it shows that the court regarded the question of granting a new trial to Mexico as a political or diplomatic one, which even Congress could not interfere with farther than to make a "request" as distinguished from a law.

And it results, a fortiori, that it is impossible for Congress to send to the Supreme Court, for its decision, this nonjudicial inquiry regarding what is required of the Executive by considerations of "honor," political morality, or public expediency.

A fair retrial is now an impossibility—Death of the company's witnesses.

Our next proposition is that it is flagrantly and manifestly unjust to now overthrow this award by this one-sided and partial trial to be had under rules unknown in all civilized States, and this at a time when all the witnesses that could know anything about this alleged fraud are dead.

Testimony could not now be taken for the company in Mexico.

Another reason is the impossibility of the company now taking testimony in Mexico. The transactions to be proved occurred twenty years ago, and it is nearly twelve years since the award was made. The proposed evidence, if taken at all, must be sought in a mountainous, almost inaccessible mining district in the State of Durango, and among a semibarbarous people, which (as is the case in all mining localities) is a constantly changing population. After such a lapse of time, in such a locality, and among such a people, and after the failure of memory, the disappearance and death of witnesses, the taking of such testimony is palpably and literally impossible. Add to all this the enormous expense attending the quest for evidence and the taking thereof, and it needs but be stated to anyone having the slightest experience regarding trials in human courts to make it obvious that the obstacles to the procurement of such evidence (whatever the facts may be) are simply insurmountable.

But if these obstacles were not insuperable, the hostility of the Mexican officials would be. Before, when there was comparatively no excitement about the case of said company, other than such as resulted from the fact that the company was American, the quest for evidence had to be made under armed protection to the life of the company's agent, and at the expense of an accompanying armed guard hired at the seaport Mazatlan. And to deter and prevent any testimony being given in favor of said company, the Mexican judge of that district threatened and intimidated the witnesses who were brought before him by the company's agent; and he declared that he would take no testimony for the company when its attorney was present, and declared that none should be taken in his court that would aid the company; and he incited manifestations of mob and other violence, such as endangered the life of witnesses, attorneys, and others evincing friendliness to the company. Besides all this, its witnesses were spirited away and kept from testifying.

All these supremely disgraceful proceedings are matters of record, and are before you in the case. And now, after the hue and cry which has been made about this case, no witness resident in Mexico, and especially in that district, who should hereafter testify the truth in favor of this American company, would be permitted to live in that country, or dare to testify, and no man competent to ascertain and select the proper evidence would hazard his life by going there and attempting to obtain it. The recent foul murder of the superintendent of the mines of an American company (Mr. Baldwin), situate in the same State of Durango, and in the same general locality, "for no other crime than that he was an American," is only one more of the many evidences that the hostility in that district, which expelled the Abra Company, there still bears sway, and with all the fullness of its pristine vigor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] takes the floor in reply to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST], as I understand he desires to do upon the case, I wish to make a very few remarks.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator wish to proceed to-night?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a case which is very much in point here, called the Gardiner case. It was a case between a citizen of the United States and the Government arising out of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo made with Mexico. I will read the points in regard to that matter, omitting a great many citations of proceedings and statutes which are not necessary to be put upon the record:

By Articles XIV and XV of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, concluded February 2, 1848 (Pub. Treaties, pp. 497, 408)—

Mr. GEORGE. From the decision of what court is the Senator reading?

Mr. MORGAN. The Supreme Court of the United States. I am not reading from the decision itself—the United States discharged Mexico from all prior claims of American citizens and agreed to "make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding $3,250,000.

Those are the old claims anterior to the Mexican war, which our Government assumed to pay to its own citizens, fixing the amount at $3,250,000.

Article XV further stipulated that—

"To ascertain the validity and amount of those claims a Board of Commissioners shall be established by the Government of the United States, whose awards shall be final and conclusive."

That was part of the agreement between Mexico and the United States. The United States was to establish this board of commissioners and their agreement or decision was to be conclusive.

Before the commission established under that treaty one George A. Gardiner brought a claim for the value of mines, etc., in the province of Rio Verde, State of San Luis Potosi, Mexico, from which he alleged that he had been unlawfully driven by officers of the Mexican Government. On this claim the commissioners made an award of $423,750, which was paid to Gardiner or his assignees on or about the 16th May, 1851 (Senate Report No. 182, first session Thirty-third Congress, vol. 2, part 2, pp. 347 et seq.).

By the Government of the United States.

Information having been obtained that the claim of Gardiner was fraudulent, in July, 1851, Gardiner and his brother, John C., were indicted for the false swearing, and the bankers of Gardiner (Corcoran & Riggs in Washington, and the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company in New York) were notified by the Treasury Department that the Government claimed the moneys of Gardiner in their hands. Gardiner was subsequently indicted for forgery, and his brother for perjury on his trial. The former was finally convicted on the indictment for false swearing at the December term, 1855, of the criminal court of the District of Columbia (same report, pp. 50 and 346, 347). Being sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, Gardiner committed suicide.

April 28, 1852, Mr. Olds, of Ohio, offered in the House of Representatives a resolution, which was objected to, asking the President for the information obtained by the Government in the matter of the Gardiner claim; also why the trial of Gardiner was delayed, and whether any Cabinet minister had received any portion of the award (Globe, vol. 20, part 2, p. 1207).

In the Senate Mr. Soulé, on the 11th of June, 1852, offered a resolution similar to the first clause of the above (Ib., p. 555).

June 28, 1852, Mr. Olds offered another resolution, reciting the allegations of fraud in the claim and of Secretary Corwin's connection with it, and raising a committee of five to investigate (Ib., p. 1628).

The committee was raised and they went on with the investigation.

August 3, 1854, Mr. Stanton made a report from the House Judiciary Committee (House Report 369, first session Thirty-third Congress) accompanying a further bill "to prevent frauds on the Treasury of the United States," and offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to institute proceedings in law or equity against all such agents, attorneys, and confederates as may have assisted in prosecuting the claims of George A. Gardiner and John H. Mears, or either of them, before the board of commissioners appointed under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo for the adjudication of claims on Mexico, in order to test their liability to refund the amounts paid them as agents, attorneys, confederates, or assignees out of the awards made by the said commissioners to said Gardiner or Mears" (Ib., p. 2139).

Bills had been filed against Gardiner in the United States circuit courts in Washington and New York, and injunctions obtained in July, 1852 (Senate Report 182, first session Thirty-third Congress, p. 347). Decrees were rendered in favor of the United States March 29, 1855, in Washington, and June 14, 1859, in New York (see docket entries).

The record of the suit in Washington seems to have been lost. From the record of the suit in New York it appears that the United States set forth in its bills the provisions of the treaty with regard to the "finality" of the awards and the stipulation of the United States "to make satisfaction" of the same; charged upon evidence discovered since the award and payment that the claim of Gardiner was "wholly false and fraudulent" and prayed—

"That the said award so made by the said Board of Commissioners may be adjudged and declared void, and the said George A. Gardiner may be decreed to restore, refund, and repay" the amount thereof. The decree is to the effect "that said award be and the same is hereby in all things reversed and annulled."

Now, the Senator will notice here that the resolution under which this proceeding went did not provide that the Commission should go still further and ascertain whether, after all, there was not some basis of claim in favor of Gardiner against Mexico upon which something might have been allowed to Gardiner and Mears. It simply took the ground that if that award had been obtained by Gardiner and Mears through fraud and perjury, it should be set aside and the money should be refunded, and it gave the courts jurisdiction to proceed in that matter and to that extent, and only to that extent.

On these decrees some $250,000 were recovered.

Messrs. Corcoran and Riggs, who were innocent parties here in the city, gentlemen of the highest possible repute, paid back the money they had got, although they must have lost heavily by it.

It thus appears that the whole power of the United States in its three departments of government—both branches of the legislature, the executive, and the civil and criminal courts—was used to bring Gardiner to justice and to recover the money paid on his fraudulent claim.

No consideration of "vested rights" in the claimant prevented the United States from interfering with the final and conclusive award in his favor, when the protection of the Treasury was in question.

But this was not all. The Government of Mexico, without being asked to release the United States from the stipulations of the treaty, was called upon to assist the latter in the Congressional investigations and in the civil suits and criminal prosecutions.

A commission was sent to Mexico by the select committee of the Senate, and was instructed, among other things, "to take sworn declarations as to the fact from the competent authorities;" "to secure the evidence of Don Santiago Gomez, and to force him, through the Mexican authorities, to produce the books;"—

Directing a committee of the Senate to appeal to the Mexican authorities to use their power to compel their own citizens to produce their books and witnesses—to bring Gardiner's witnesses "before some alcalde" and "have them examined de novo;"—

They had been examined once, and this proposition was to examine them de novo—

to get them to point out to the Commission and the alcalde the location of the mines; to have Gardiner "summoned"; and to "obtain from the authorities what orders you (they) may deem necessary to facilitate your (their) mission." (Senate Report 182, first session Thirty-third Congress, pp. 115, 116.)

The United States secretary of legation in Mexico was notified by the State Department of the appointment of the Commission for the purpose of obtaining "evidence to convict Gardiner and recover back the money paid to him," and was informed that—

"This Government requests, asa favor on the part ofMexico, that such measures be adopted by it as may be necessary to protect the gentlemen sent on this Commission on their way to and from the said department of Rio Verde, and that instructions be given to the local authorities to afford them every aid and facility in procuring evidence and in performing the duty assigned to them." (Ib., p. 153.)

On the 8th of November, 1852, "Mr. May and Mr. Partridge," members of the Commission, "accompanied by Mr. Rich," chargé d'affaires of the United States, "waited upon the minister of relations, Mr. Yonez, and were by him introduced to President Arista." The President and minister examined the documents filed by Gardiner in support of his claim, pronounced them informal, and "expressed their unqualified opinion" that the claim was false and fraudulent.

"The President promised [say the Commissioners] to give us the aid and coöperation of his Government, as well as that of the several States which we might visit in order to the fulfillment of our duties. He requested that we would indicate in writing through our charge the precise kind of service that we required." (Ib., pp. 117, 118.)

On the two following days the Commissioners indicated to the chargé (pp. 154, 155) the kind of assistance required by them, which comprised instructions to the civil and military authorities in the State of San Luis Potosi, Queretaro, and Michoacan, and the services of a military officer to accompany them on their mission.

All this and much more was freely granted, almost every page of the commissioners' report bearing evidence to the active good will of, and the assistance rendered by, the authorities of Mexico, State and federal, executive and judicial. The results of the civil and criminal suits above referred to show how valuable and effective was this assistance.

Mexico had no possible pecuniary interest in invalidating the award of Gardiner. On the contrary, she ran the risk of having his claim revived against her in case the award should be unjustly annulled. It is true that the United States would be debarred by the treaty from seeking to enforce it diplomatically, but in morals and by her own law Mexico would have been bound to pay it and hold the United States responsible for a violation of the treaty.

The course of Mexico could only have been governed by a desire to treat the United States with justice and comity, and of course by a well-founded expectation of like treatment from the latter on similar occasion. Such expectation was justified by the diplomatic promise of the United States chargé d'affaires, who, in writing to the minister of foreign affairs on the 9th of November, 1852, said:

"By complying with the request of Mr. May the Mexican Government will confer a great obligation upon that of the United States, and which that Government will always be happy to reciprocate" (Ib., p. 157).

It was further justified by the promise of the minister of the United States, Mr. Alfred Conkling, who, in a note dated December 7, 1852, thanked the minister "for the valuable aid already so courteously rendered by him," regretted "the necessity of again invoking" his assistance, and added:

"Should the Government of Mexico at any future time stand in need of similar acts of comity on the part of the Government of the undersigned, he trusts he need hardly assure his excellency that they will be most cheerfully and promptly rendered" (Ib., p. 158).

You have had a sample of the return of that in the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] this afternoon.

Mr. DOLPH. I will not take the floor to-night, as I understand the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] will be ready to speak to-morrow. If he is, I will postpone my remarks until after he has concluded.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WATER SUPPLY FOR PENITENTIARY AT M'NEILS ISLAND, STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Attorney-General, and its inclosures, in relation to the water supply for the United States penitentiary on McNeils Island, Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

MARY F. LEWIS AND DAVID B. ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House letters from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Mary F. Lewis vs. The United States and David B. Anderson vs. The United States; which were severally referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report back the bill (H. R. 1218) for the relief of Charles M. Kennerly, and the bill (H. R. 1523) for the relief of John Regan, which were improperly referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back the bill (H. R. 1857) granting an honorable discharge certificate to Hugh Kerr, late of Company F, First Battalion, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, which was improperly referred to our committee, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The correction in the reference will be made.

Mr. BARWIG. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill (H. R. 2777) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the establishment of a park in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, be recalled and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that this bill be recalled from the Committee on the District of Columbia and referred to the Committee on Appropriations? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 398) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to employ a special agent to investigate judgments and other debts due to the United States and to secure the collection thereof, which has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill contains no authority for making an appropriation, and at the last Congress it was before and action was taken upon it by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman please send the bill to the Clerk's desk? [After a pause.] The Chair is of the opinion that the reference was correct. The bill provides for the appointment of officers in an Executive Department of the Government. But the Chair will state the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the House. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 398) providing for the appointment of additional officers to investigate the question of claims allowed by the Court of Claims shall be withdrawn from the Committee on Appropriations and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER NEAR LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Mr. BRODERICK obtained unanimous consent to introduce a bill (H. R. 4272) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 2 miles north and 2 miles south of the city of Leavenworth, in the county of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AWARDS TO CREEK INDIANS.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced by myself, the number of which is not given in the RECORD, for the purpose of settling the awards to the Creek Indians, and which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman indicate the title of the bill again?

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, the bill is for the purpose of paying awards that were made several years ago by a commission of the United States to the loyal Creek Indians in the Indian Territory. I say by mistake this bill was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. We had the same bill before that committee in the last Congress and reported upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him, for the settlement of certain awards to Indians, be taken from the Committee on War Claims and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill (H. R. 504) in relation to the western judicial district of Wisconsin. It is a bill providing for the time of holding a court. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 504) in relation to the western judicial district of Wisconsin.

Be it enacted, etc., That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts in the western district of Wisconsin shall be held at the times and places following:

At Eau Claire, on the first Tuesday in June; at Superior, on the second Tuesday in July; at La Crosse, on the third Tuesday in September, and at Madison on the first Tuesday in December in each year; and the clerk residing at Madison shall attend all terms of said courts at Eau Claire and Superior as clerk thereof.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, as the report of the committee on this bill has not been printed, I will simply state that there is no change by this bill with reference to the place where the courts have heretofore been held. During the last session of last Congress a place was fixed for holding a term of court, but no time has been fixed for the holding of the court at that place; and it is done by this bill. That is all there is of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MODE OF TAKING DEPOSITIONS.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama reports the bill, which the Clerk will read, and asks unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary is not accompanied by any written report, but I desire to have the bill engrossed and read the third time, and will explain the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 435) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the mode of taking the depositions of witnesses in causes pending at law or equity in the district and circuit courts of the United States, it shall be lawful to take the depositions or testimony of witnesses in the mode prescribed by the laws of the State in which the courts are held.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House in two preceding Congresses, but failed in the Senate. It is quite simple in its provisions. It only provides for the taking of depositions in the courts of the United States according to the rules and methods prevailing in the State courts. It is cumulative. It does not interfere with the present method of taking depositions, but only proposes to adopt the methods of the State courts as well, so as to give parties a choice.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TO DEFINE AND PUNISH BLACKMAILING.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to report back the bill (H. R. 9) to define and punish blackmailing, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who, within the District of Columbia or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall levy or attempt to levy blackmail on any other person by making, threatening, or attempting to make any disclosure, oral or written or by publication, within or outside of such district or place, injurious to the character of any person, for the purpose of obtaining money or other benefit, or for the purpose of ridicule or revenge, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof before any court having jurisdiction for the trial of crimes or misdemeanors within the place or territory in which such offense is committed, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, and shall be imprisoned or confined at hard labor for not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court trying the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the first part of that bill was not distinctly heard, and I ask that it be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and to the House that this bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and that in the opinion of the committee it ought to pass. The bill is reported from the committee without dissent.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions of the following titles were severally introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred as indicated below:

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

By Mr. COGSWELL: A bill (H. R. 4273) to prevent cruelty to children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PENALTY FOR TAKING ILLEGAL RATES OF INTEREST.

By Mr. SNODGRASS: A bill (H. R. 4274) making it a misdemeanor for any association doing business under the national banking laws of the United States to charge or take an illegal rate of interest, and to confer upon the States and Territories concurrent jurisdiction with the United States—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CHAMPLAIN AND ST. LAWRENCE RAILROAD.

By Mr. CURTIS: A bill (H. R. 4275) to grant to the Champlain and St. Lawrence Railroad Company a right of way across the Fort Montgomery military reservation—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMPENSATION OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

By Mr. CUMMINGS: A bill (H. R. 4276) relating to the compensation of fourth-class postmasters—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

OBSERVANCE OF LABOR DAY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

By Mr. LODGE: A joint resolution (H. Res. 62) providing for the observance of Labor Day in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

GEN. NAPOLEON J. T. DANA.

By Mr. McKENNA: A bill (H. R. 4277) for the relief of Gen. Napoleon J. T. Dana—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This appears to be a private bill.

Mr. McKENNA. I think not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after examining the bill). The Chair is inclined to think it is a private bill, but will give it the benefit of the doubt.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT JACKSON, KY.

By Mr. KENDALL: A bill (H. R. 4278) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Kentucky at Jackson, in said district, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF PINKERTON DETECTIVE AGENCY.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to withdraw from the Committee on the Judiciary a resolution introduced by myself the other day and referred to that committee. In explanation of this request I desire to say this: The resolution instructs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the character, organization, and operation of the Pinkerton Detective Agency. The question raised is purely a legal question, but the resolution is now before the Committee on the Judiciary really for the purpose of having that committee recommend whether or not they shall be instructed to investigate that agency.

I think, on consideration, that that question can be determined by the House, that it should be determined by the House, and that its determination by the House would expedite the work to be done by the committee; and, the matter being a very important one, which I presume concerns every man upon this floor who is in any way interested in labor, or who is a friend to labor, I ask unanimous consent that that resolution be withdrawn from the Committee on the Judiciary, so that the House may decide whether or not we will instruct that committee to make the investigation into the character, rules, regulations, forces, arms, and equipment of the Pinkerton Detective Agency, in order to determine whether or not it is a legally constituted body, or whether it is not dangerous to the civil institutions of this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's request can be granted only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WATSON. I am aware of that.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's resolution is before the Judiciary Committee and has been referred to a subcommittee over which I have the honor to preside. I will remind the gentleman and the House that the practice in such cases is for the committee to whom a resolution is referred to report it back, recommending either its adoption or its nonadoption. I think, therefore, that the gentleman is a little "previous" in making this request. If he will just wait until the next meeting of the committee I have no doubt that his resolution will be reported back with a recommendation either that it be adopted or that it be not adopted. Meanwhile I object to the request.

Mr. WATSON. That statement, Mr. Speaker, is perfectly satisfactory to me. I only want to have the resolution acted upon.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

By unanimous consent, additional bills were introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred as below:

UNITED STATES CUSTOM-HOUSE, FALL RIVER, MASS.

By Mr. RANDALL: A bill (H. R. 4279) to provide for the acquisition of land adjacent to the United States custom-house and post-office building in Fall River, Mass.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PENSACOLA TERMINAL COMPANY.

By Mr. RAYNER: A bill (H. R. 4280) to grant the right of way to the Pensacola Terminal Company through the lands of the naval reservation near Pensacola—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HUTCHISON AND SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PEEL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which I send to the desk, and which I have been directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report favorably.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BURROWS. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from the city of Anthony, in the State of Kansas, through the Indian Territory, to some point in the county of Grayson, in the State of Texas," approved September 26, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"That said railroad company be, and they are hereby, authorized to extend and operate said road, telegraph, and telephone line with like powers and privileges and under like limitations and conditions as are provided in said original act, in a southeasterly or southerly direction from the terminus of said road under said original act, to wit: From its connection with the Santa Fé Railroad at or near the city of Guthrie, in the Territory of Oklahoma, or some point north of there within a distance of 20 miles to the southern boundary of said Indian Territory, at or near a point north of the city of Denison, in the State of Texas."

SEC. 2. That said original act described in section 1 of this act, and the amendment thereto, shall extend and be in full force and effect for the period of three years from the approval of this amendment or act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BURROWS. I reserve the right to object until the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] can make some explanation.

Mr. PEEL. I should like to do so.

Mr. BURROWS. I am fearful that this bill is in conflict with the resolution we have recently adopted about grants of public lands to corporations. [Laughter.] I think the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had better be called to it.

Mr. PEEL. This bill does not conflict with that resolution at all, I assure the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, during the last Congress an act was passed granting right of way to this railroad company from Anthony, Kans., to Guthrie, Okla. That law, a copy of which I hold in my hand, contains the usual guaranties and protections to the Indians in regard to their private settlements, and reserves to Congress the right to amend or repeal the act whenever Congress may see proper. That law also contains the usual clause making the grant unassignable, etc.

This bill is simply an amendment to that act, and proposes to authorize this company to extend its line under the same conditions and limitations and with the same privileges granted in the original act. The bill has been referred to the Interior Department and has been examined by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose letters recommending the bill accompany the report. The bill carries no appropriation; it simply extends the right of way of this company. I am certain that, as it is merely an amendment of an act of the last Congress, my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] will not object.

Mr. BURROWS. Does it give any portion of the public domain to this railroad company?

Mr. PEEL. None, except what the laws have always given to companies under similar circumstances.

Mr. BURROWS. Then it does give some portion of the public domain to a private corporation. That being the case, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Government does not own any of the land through which this road passes; it belongs to the Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS. The right to object was reserved, with the understanding that the gentleman from Indiana might have an opportunity to make an explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very much obliged to my friend from Michigan for his vigilance. I do not remember the exact purport of the original act; but I believe it contains the usual provisions for the appraisement of the land taken for right of way, and provides for the payment of compensation under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. PEEL. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the act referred to embraced also the limitations usually imposed upon railroad companies, which have been permitted to construct their roads through the Indian Territory, as to the cost of transportation and the like.

Mr. PEEL. There are the same limitations in that respect.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the charter now granted is subject to the same conditions and limitations as those in the original act.

Mr. PEEL. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. But it gives public land to a private corporation.

Mr. PEEL. It does not give away a foot of any public land.

Mr. BURROWS. Then how is the road to be carried through?

Mr. PEEL. This is a road through the Indian Territory, where the land does not belong to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the bill provides that compensation shall be made to the extent of the value of the land taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is not a foot of the public domain along the line of this road.

Mr. BURROWS. Then the proposition is to give away the land of other people—not our own.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan object?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I do not know whether I object or not, until I have asked a question.

Mr. PEEL. I yield for the gentleman's question.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Has this bill been referred to any committee?

Mr. PEEL. It is reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BUSHNELL. That is what I wanted to know. If that statement was previously made I did not catch it.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PEEL, the motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. HARTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4281) for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 123) fixing the times for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States in the northern district of Iowa; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PENDLETON up to and including Friday next, on account of important business.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3513) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, concerning this bill, the title of which has just been read, and which I believe is now open for discussion, I must, in the first place, compliment the Public Printer on the marvelous speed that he has displayed in getting it ready for presentation to the House. The time that elapsed between the report of the committee and the time when it was returned from the Public Printing Office to the document room was but three days, while we have been waiting for the printing at his office of important bills, introduced as early as the 6th day of January, and which were only this morning delivered to the document room. This bill, so peculiar and extraordinary in its effects on the Public Printer and his office, was presented on the 13th day of January, and on Saturday last, January the 16th, we find it with the voluminous report bound and ready for the use of the House. The speed that has been displayed in the attempt to force this bill through the House is also most admirable.

I am, too, the more pleased, Mr. Speaker, that this extraordinary zeal has been shown, because it indicates that in the event of trouble with any other country our Departments would have everything ready and we could be equipped for any emergency in a very few days; that is, if we may take this as a criterion.

I have been trying in the limited time permitted me to examine throughout this extraordinary document, and I think that it would be well that we should begin with the title and call it "a bill to enlarge the powers and privileges of the Public Printer and to lessen his liabilities." How this bill could be reported to this House without first having gone through the scrutinizing glances of a Democratic Committee on Printing is a marvel to me. I have tried to find the merit that is said to be in this bill. I find whatever of good there is in it is now the law; the changes suggested are the obnoxious features of the bill.

I find in the brief time I have had to examine it a great many features that satisfy me at once that this bill should have the heel of disapprobation put on it here, unless the House thinks that it should be sent to the Committee on Printing to be pruned of its many obnoxious features.

I will only call the attention of the House now to some of the proposed changes. Here is one of them, section 32, which abolishes the branch printing offices in the Census Department, in the Pension Department, in the Adjutant-General's Department, and in the Agricultural Department; there are other Departments involved that I can not now recall, and it is not true, as has been stated, that the heads of these Departments recommend the abolition of the printing offices in their various bureaus or Departments.

On the contrary, nearly all them expressly state that the work is done in many cases better and cheaper than at the Public Printing Office. This is especially true of the Census Office. If you want to find the reason why the Public Printer, who, it is stated here, is so very much in favor of this change, desires to concentrate these various offices under his control, I will give you a reason in brief. With a relentless partisanship he has discharged several hundred competent and efficient printers and other workmen, and filled their places with less experienced, if not less competent men; their skill could not save them—they belonged to another party, and had to go. Many of the men so discharged to-day are employed in these other offices; in fact, nearly all of the men employed in these branch offices are men who have been formerly employed at the Government Printing Office, and I think it would be extraordinary if this House would extend the scope of this man's power and would permit him to follow up his purposes and during his term of office enable him to continue the banishment of these men from place and employment.

I find another serious objection to this bill. Congress, a few years ago, in 1888, in order to give emphasis to the eight-hour law, a law that had been passed in response to the demand of the working classes, and which had been disregarded in the Government Printing Office, found it necessary to attach to a bill an emphatic demand on the Public Printer that he should rigidly enforce the provisions of the eight-hour law in that office. This law was in force at the time the present Public Printer took charge. Should this bill be recommitted to the committee, and they desire to investigate the question, I will guaranty to prove by the printers themselves, that the Public Printer has not alone deliberately violated and is now violating the spirit of the law and ignoring the instructions of both branches of Congress in that respect, but that through his agents and his employés he has brought the influence of his department to work to compel the Typographical Union to rescind their rule demanding its rigid enforcement in that office, and prohibiting their members from working over eight hours.

In this bill the act of February 18, 1888, that I have referred to, is skillfully omitted, and its omission is not accidental, and at the end of the bill you will find that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with it are repealed. There are not many accidents about work of this kind. I desire now to call your attention to section 46. Congress thought proper to provide that in employing labor in that department the Public Printer should only employ men who were competent. The law passed by Congress July 31, 1876, provides that "it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to employ no workman who is not thoroughly skilled in the respective branches of the industry." And my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will pardon me for referring to this matter as to the Public Printer, for out of justice to the gentleman from Tennessee I may be permitted to say that I do not believe he is aware of all the features of this bill or the changes in existing law contemplated to be made in that office. This bill, I am informed, came through the Senate committee; it is mainly their work.

Going back to the act of July 31, 1876, providing for employment of none but skilled workmen, in this bill we find that it only applies to printers and binders, so that the Public Printer could fill the places of the proof-readers, copyists, stereotypers, machinists, and all the elements of the trade employed there, without requiring any test of competency, fitness, or skill.

Another remarkable feature of this bill is when it proposes to compel the members of Congress to furnish a list of the names of those they propose to favor to a superintendent appointed by the President, who will take charge of our affairs and distribute our books. This would provide offices for men who need them, but that it would save one dollar, I do not believe. Any abuse about sending away documents or to get rid of the accumulated books at the Capitol is a matter we can easily reach by resolution. This House will not, I am sure, seriously entertain the proposed change.

The provisions of the bill permitting exchange of old presses for new, the permission to purchase supplies at the market rates and without contract, the criminal feature which only punishes when he corruptly colludes to defraud the Government, and in fact the defects which such a brief examination as I have been permitted to make of this bill, satisfies me that it is not deserving of consideration, nor do I fear that this House will permit it to pass.

Now, I am aware that after I have finished what remarks I have to make on this bill the reply will be made, "If you do not like these features then as we progress under the five-minute rule we will change them." How can you expect to change the features of a bill of this kind, so full of objectionable features? The report was only printed within the last two days, and was only accessible to members since yesterday.

It is indeed difficult to know just how many Africans are hid away in this wood pile. We can not tell. There is but one course to take in regard to this bill, and that is, now that the attention of the House has been called to it, to either kill the bill now or send it back to the committee and have that committee go through this measure from beginning to end. The Committee on Printing can give us all of the reforms that might be embraced in a bill of this kind and we could adopt them, and omit the other features that neither Congress nor the country desire.

I move, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. The House has agreed to debate the bill. I hope it will not be recommitted. The Committee on Printing have reported it here. The Joint Committee on Printing have examined it and prepared it with great care. I have no reply to make to the remarks of the gentleman when he says that this House has not had any time to examine this bill, and when he says somebody else, outside of this House, some other gentleman, has prepared it and is responsible for it.

As I said on yesterday, I do not claim, speaking for myself, that it is a perfect measure. It is open to discussion and amendment. I do not claim any particular honor for having assisted in its preparation. I will merely say that so far as I am concerned, as a member of the joint committee charged with the preparation of the bill, I did my duty and attended every session of the joint committee, with possibly two or three exceptions. We spent seventy-five or one hundred days in the sessions of the committee, and I do not think I was absent from them to exceed three and possibly not over two days. I hope the House will not recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear any authority the gentleman has on the point that it is not in order at this time to move to recommit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The reason I submit that it is not in order is this: The House has by unanimous consent made it a special order. We have agreed to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and then that, after the general discussion, it should be considered by sections and by items. That order of the House has not been executed. It has not been considered by sections or by items at all, and now I think that we should carry out the order already made. That is the reason I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to hear any authority which the gentleman has upon the subject; but the Chair thinks that the motion to recommit comes under the designation of consideration. It is one method of "consideration," and is one means of disposing of it. Therefore, in the absence of any authority, the Chair would hold that the motion is in order at this time. The Chair thinks it is for the House to determine how far it will go after the adoption of a special order before it applies any one of the various methods of disposition to the measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will allow some little time for the examination of this bill. The gentleman made a very interesting speech upon the subject yesterday, but I take it for granted that most of the members of the House would like more time in which to examine the bill before voting upon a measure of so much importance. It is comparatively a new measure. It has been before the House but a very few days. It is an exceedingly important and radical measure. There are many excellent provisions in it, but I must say that I am apprehensive of some of the provisions; and I suggest therefore the expediency of the policy of allowing the matter to go over. There will not be any great press of business for the next few days, and I would suggest to the gentleman to let the measure go over till next Monday or Tuesday, to give us all an opportunity of understanding the effect of its provisions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I desire to say that I am perfectly content to have the measure go over to any reasonable time. On yesterday, after discussing it, I myself asked to have it go over until to-morrow, in order that members might have the opportunity to examine this elaborate report upon the bill; but other gentlemen thought it best to proceed to-day with its consideration. Now, I am perfectly willing for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to make his motion to send it over till to-morrow, or until next Monday, or until any day in the early future. I will not oppose that, but I do object to its being recommitted to the committee. The committee have spent much time upon it and have reported it to this House with a favorable recommendation. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will make a motion to postpone to any day which he may consider advisable in the near future, there will be no objection upon my part.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I make the point of order that the motion to recommit would take precedence.

Mr. HOLMAN. There being a motion pending to recommit, I suppose the motion to postpone until a later day would not be in order until after the disposition of the pending motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that until general debate is closed, the bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, if other gentlemen desire to discuss it, the Chair will recognize them for that purpose. The Chair thinks that at any time after the consideration of a bill has been entered upon, that debate being closed, it would be in order to move to recommit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood that to be the point of order which I made, that general debate had not been closed, and that the House had ordered, by unanimous consent, that there should be general debate upon the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the Chair would state to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that if no gentleman rose to further engage in general debate that would necessarily close general debate. Of course, if any gentleman did rise the Chair would recognize him. The statement which the Chair made was on the assumption that no gentleman desired to further engage in general debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, if the Chair understands that general debate had closed, the Chair is mistaken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No gentleman has yet addressed the Chair for the purpose of asking recognition.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask recognition of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I propose to debate the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Missouri later if he withdraws it now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If any gentleman desires to be heard I will yield to him. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTONE].

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the motion to recommit will be entertained after general debate has closed, if the gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Then I withdraw my motion until after general debate is closed, with the understanding that I will be recognized then to make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Then I withdraw my motion to recommit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to any agreement being made as to recognition. I do not think the Chair ought to agree to recognize the gentleman for that motion.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to offer an amendment to this bill?

The SPEAKER protempore. Not until general debate is closed. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] is recognized.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was in hopes that the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] would be acquiesced in and that this bill would be recommitted. The bill, in my judgment, proceeds upon an entirely wrong basis. It proceeds upon the basis that we must cut down the number of documents published by the Government and distributed among the people. On that score I for one have heard no complaint. The only complaint which I have heard among the people is that the documents published here are not sufficient in number to supply the demand. There is a cry for more instead of a demand for less; and the economy which is now about to be entered upon, for that reason, is neither wise nor popular.

The bill contains features which this House will never acquiesce in. There are several provisions—it is not my purpose to call attention to all of them—but there are several provisions which are especially objectionable. I for one consider the provision that under certain circumstances, and during the greater portion of each Congressional term, the Committee on Printing of the Senate shall have entire charge of the publication of documents by the Government. That is an improper provision. In some way we must provide differently for that matter. Instead of giving more power to the Senate, instead of yielding in any degree more of consequence to that body, I would curb them, and would at least, Mr. Speaker, confine them to their absolute functions under the Constitution. I would assert, so far as in me lies, the power given to this House under the Constitution, which places us, as holding the purse of the United States, in the attitude of being the chief branch of the Congress of the United States.

I have seen this process go on before I came here, and especially since I have been a member of this body; and during the last thirty years, step by step, the House has lost in consequence, lost in power, and has to a greater or less degree—to a greater, in my judgment—abdicated the power that is given to us under the Constitution. We have lost practically all control over appropriation bills. The Senate coerces us into the adoption of measures under the guise of amendment, and coerces us into the support of measures which neither our reasons, our consciences, nor our sense of duty approve.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire for a moment to interrupt the gentleman from Michigan, if it will not interfere with him, to make a statement in this connection.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The criticism which the gentleman offers upon section 17 is that it is giving to the Senate committee power that is exercised by the joint committee when there is no House committee.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The object of that is simply this: During the month of December, as we know, every two years, there is no Committee on Printing of the House. During that month it is necessary very often, indeed universally, to take some action in regard to printing. For instance, if the gentleman from Michigan were to make a speech and wanted to insert a map in it when printed, he could not get that into the RECORD without the consent of the committee, and his speech would have to lie over a month. The letting out of contracts for printing, advertising for bids for specimens or samples of paper, and of material to be bid upon for the fiscal year beginning in December, and in order that this work of printing may be started, that these advertisements may be made, the Senate committee would have power to act in the absence of the House committee. That is the object of this section, without giving any additional power to the Senate committee.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the object is very plain, and it was hardly worth while to take up my time with the explanation. I am not saying that the object is an improper one. I have made no such assault upon the bill, but I simply say that some other way should be found by which to effect that object.

I will now make this further criticism, because it is a good occasion upon which to make it; the necessity which exists, for the Senate Committee as proposed in this bill, illustrates how inartificial—I almost said how undemocratic—our form of government is. There is a time, from the 4th of March down to December, in which the people of the United States are not represented by the Representatives whom they have elected to represent them here; and the moral which I draw from that—and this is a proper occasion in which to draw that moral—is, that we should change the time for the assembling of Congress, and let the date of our assembling be on the 4th of March, when our term of office commences.

But, Mr. Speaker, I find here a provision by which the editing of the RECORD is turned over to this Committee on Printing. Why is that proposed? What is the matter with the RECORD? Does anybody find fault with the manner in which it is conducted now? It may be that some gentleman of superfine taste—some gentleman who is sensitive as to the beauties of the English language—would like some of the matter which falls from the lips of some of us here changed. It might be that some gentleman may differ as to the importance of matters which now go into the RECORD, and might say to you or to me that certain matters are of no importance, whereas when it goes to our constituents it may be the very life or death of our political career.

It may be a matter of immense importance, not simply to the member, but to the locality from which he comes. What is the difficulty with the RECORD now? What fault is found with it? Is it a question of fastidiousness? If that is all, then let us go on in the old way. But if we are to have an editor of the RECORD, let us have one responsible man, not a committee consisting of so many Senators and so many Representatives, who may cut and slash, who may change your meaning, who may suppress your meaning.

Let us have some one man who will be responsible to the House, and, as I think, we have one man who is responsible, the Speaker, under whose supervision the RECORD is made up. I, for one, do not desire any censor over what I say here. I do not desire any gentleman, however scholastic his capacity, however refined his taste, to correct my grammar or to substitute his English for my English. I wish what I say here to go to the people exactly as I say it; and I think that is the wish of every member of this House in his own case. For one I am unwilling to make this change and to confer this power upon a committee instead of leaving it where it is now, subject to the will of the entire House every morning when we assemble here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg the gentlemen's pardon, but I do not quite understand what provision of the bill he is now criticising. What change does he refer to?

Mr. CHIPMAN. The change providing for editing the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no provision in the bill for an editor of the RECORD, or for the revision of members' remarks.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Then, perhaps, I have got the wrong copy copy of the bill. But let us see:

SEC. 13. The Joint Committee shall have control of the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and while providing that it shall be substantially a verbatim report of proceedings, shall take all needed action for the reduction of unnecessary bulk, and shall provide for the publication of an index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semimonthly during the sessions of Congress and at the close thereof.

Why, sir, in taking action for the reduction of "unnecessary bulk" they may strike out the very choicest English in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I can assure my friend that that provision of the bill is not justly liable to the criticism he is making. There is no intention at all to provide for revising the speeches of members.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that my friend's intentions are entirely honorable. [Laughter.] But under that provision even the strong and beautiful things that I am saying now might come under the censorship and fail to appear in to-morrow's RECORD. The joint committee might think they were too "bulky." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, my observation here is that if there is any thing that a member loves, especially in his speeches, it is bulk. [Laughter.] He likes to see it ripple and flow and meander indefinitely from one end of the RECORD to the other. [Laughter.] Why, sir, I know gentlemen who have been in the RECORD every day since I have been in Congress, and undoubtedly they will be among the first victims to this new process of reducing "unnecessary bulk." [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another provision in this bill to which I object. I refer to the provision in regard to the superintendent of documents and their custody. Yesterday, in the debate, I asked my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] whether, under the provisions of this bill, a member could order his documents sent to him in bulk, and he said he thought he could. If that is the case, then the bill effects no reform in that respect. If that is so, there is no provision here for guarding against any evil which the bill is supposed to correct. But while I, for one, do not care to have my Congressional morals in the matter of the distribution of documents supervised, while I feel that they are entirely correct at present in that respect, and while I believe that the great mass of the members of this House distribute their documents honestly and intelligently, I suggest that, if this provision is to remain in the bill, it ought to be such as to effect some purpose. It should stop the improvident distribution of documents, if there is improvident distribution. It should take the documents entirely from the control of the member and put it into the control of this great bureau, with its chief at $3,000 a year, who, by the way, in the near future, will probably aggregate hundreds of clerks around him, such is the growth of Government bureaus in this country.

The chief of this bureau, if he should exercise the functions which the bill proposes to give him, will have absolute control over my morals and over the morals of every member of the House in relation to the distribution of documents. He can say that you and I shall not send out documents unless we send them under certain rules and regulations. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] says that is not the case, but I differ with him. The bill provides expressly that the matter of the distribution of documents shall be in the control and custody of this bureau, or office, or whatever it may be called. I wish to call the attention of members to the phraseology of sections 62 and 63 of the bill:

The President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the consent of the Senate, appoint a superintendent of documents, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution.

A friend near me asks how long this officer is to hold his office. That is a conundrum. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. How long do Cabinet officers hold office?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Oh, then we are to have a new Cabinet officer. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all. I only use that as an illustration. There is no limitation to the term of a Cabinet officer or of a postmaster. The gentleman ought to be fair in arguing this matter. What is the limitation of the term of office of a Presidential postmaster?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Four years.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Where do you find it?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I suppose it to be so.

A MEMBER. It is distinctly stated in his commission.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But there is no law for it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will not make the point that we can not in case of a change of Administration get this man out of office, whoever he is; but I wish to call attention to the language of these sections. It is provided that this officer to be appointed by the President—shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody—

The language is explicit—and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution.

Not to my custody, not to the custody of the member who is entitled to the documents, but to the custody of this superintendent to be appointed under this law. Then provision is made for the method of distribution; and upon my word I would rather make a treaty with England on the fishery question than attempt to get a document from that room under the provisions of this bill. The correspondence would be quite as voluminous as that between our Secretary of State and the British prime minister upon the Bering Sea controversy.

He shall keep the document account of members of Congress and Departments.

What do I wish him to keep my document account for? I can keep it myself. I have a book for that purpose which answers my purpose in every particular. I can keep that account; and I can keep it straight. I know that nobody will be cheated by that account when I keep it myself. I am certain all my documents will go where that book shows that they go; that is, where I desire them to go—where they will do the most good. [Laughter.]

He shall keep the document account of members of Congress and Departments, and, on request of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate, shall promptly furnish a statement of documents standing to his credit.

You can get from this high Government official that poor boon; you can get an account of the documents standing to your credit. Of course we would all feel very vain after we had gone through the performance of writing to him on the subject and getting a return in due course of mail (provided our turn had come) telling us what we had to our credit.

All orders for the distribution of documents by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates and Departments shall be sent to the superintendent of documents on franked or other labels, or in lists, which shall be kept confidential—

Nothing is said about sending orders for documents in bulk; nothing is said about having them taken to our homes, or to our rooms, and having them distributed as we desire to have them distributed. You must write your order, send it through this high functionary, and he will "keep it confidential." [Laughter.] Well, my friends, that is some comfort, provided we are sure the man is not a little "leaky." How that arrangement would work depends upon who the man is. Sometimes matters of this kind, which ought to be kept confidential, especially lists of names which will be useful for campaign purposes, go to sources not intended and are used for purposes that were never contemplated—which shall be kept confidential, and which shall give the name and address of each and every party to whom documents are ordered sent; and it shall be the duty of the superintendent of documents to establish such a system of registration by card index or otherwise—

We might as well say he shall keep a steam engine for the purpose. There is an amount of machinery here that is perfectly appalling—by card index or otherwise, as will prevent duplication in the distribution of documents.

Suppose you wish to duplicate; suppose there is a necessity to duplicate, are we to have a censor over us to admonish us that we shall not do so; that we ought not to do so? My friend from Tennessee says that when you have given the order, if the superintendent finds that you are duplicating an order given by some one else he will notify you to that effect, but that finally, after you have corresponded with him, he will send the document wherever you may be pleased to direct. But suppose the document is in immediate request; suppose you wish to have it used for a particular purpose, and at once. As I said before, you do not wish to go through a correspondence rivaling the Blaine-Salisbury correspondence on the seal question in order to get a book or a pamphlet or a map to somebody.

In a word, this is a violation of the good old way—an attempt at economy in a direction in which nobody demands economy. It is an attempt to put a guardian or censor over the members of this House, stripping us as a body of just so much power. I, for one, as a matter of principle, and as a matter of duty, would not surrender in this way the least tithe or tittle of the power which resides in this House under the Constitution, and as to which the people have made us here their agents. As well delegate other powers; as well delegate the supervision over other matters. Why, sir, there is one matter in which a supervision over the proceedings of this House has been deemed wise by a great many persons, yet the House has never seen fit to acquiesce in it; I mean the reference of contested-election cases to the judicial power as such cases are referred in England, in Canada, and in other British colonies. That would be an infringement upon the powers of this House, a giving away of some of our power, and therefore this House has never been in the mood to acquiesce in it.

This may not be a great matter. Someone may answer me and try to ridicule my position by saying that I undertake to apply a great principle to a small matter. My reply is that where a principle is involved everything is great, nothing is small, especially when the powers and the rights of the members of this House are involved. I could point, Mr. Speaker, to matter after matter in this bill which is objectionable. Take, for instance, the matter of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We receive but 21 copies of the RECORD now for distribution. By the terms of this bill the number is reduced to 20. The right thing for us to do, in justice to our constituents and to ourselves, is not to reduce the number of the copies of the RECORD we receive, but what we need to do is to increase it.

Mr. MORSE. That is right.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Increase the number, and instead of 21 copies make it 50. Increase the number and let us send it out amongst our people, at least let us see that every newspaper and public library in each district obtain a copy, which they can not do now. Even there this idea of economy, the economy of taking one RECORD from each member of the House, enters and is one of the features of this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of economy. I am in favor of wise economy. I am in favor of an economy which the intelligence of the American people will sustain. But I can say to gentlemen on this floor that the American people, whether Democrats or whether Republicans, will never support an economy which consists, not in doing things wisely, but in not doing them at all. This bill is based upon just that idea. The cry of economy is in the air. It is in the air, and I propose to stand manfully by the true economy of the present crisis. But no economy has been demanded in this direction; no change has been demanded in this regard by anybody; nobody desires it. And here is this bill, bulky, framed not by a committee of our own House, but framed in conjunction with a committee of another body; a bill so bulky that it is difficult to comprehend what is in it and what is its scope; a bill which has no necessity in the present situation of public affairs; a bill which if it economizes at all in the distribution of information among the people as to what we are doing here, is guilty of an unpatriotic, mean, and uncalled-for economy. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday afternoon, when it was proposed to terminate the general debate on this bill and discuss its provisions under the five-minute rule, it was opposed by myself, because I thought there were certain general provisions in the bill that should be scrutinized carefully by the members of this body before they came to the details. An inspection of the bill last night has convinced me of the correctness of my thought.

This bill, as it strikes me, was wisely intended, but as it is presented to the House it can be properly denominated alone as "a bill for the enlargement of the scope of executive power and the curtailment of legislative privileges." If, sir, you will take the different sections and provisions of the bill you will find the privileges of this House or of the Senate are enlarged in no single particular, and every power that is given under the bill is practically given to the executive branch of this Government.

Take for instance, and I ask the House to turn with me for a few moments to the different sections to which I shall specifically allude—turn to page 24 of the bill, section 62, and let us see what it provides:

> The President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a superintendent of documents, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution, excepting those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed on the order of Members and Delegates or are for the special official use of the Executive Departments.

Now, sir, it would seem, according to that provision, that every document that is printed by governmental authority in any of the Departments should be turned over to the superintendent of documents and their distribution should be under his supervision. Let us see whether or no that is the case. Turn to page 32 of the bill, section 77, and as you read along in the different clauses of that section you will see that every executive branch of this Government is left as it is at present, with full power to distribute its own documents. For instance, under the first clause the Department of Agriculture is authorized to make the distribution of its own reports.

A few clauses further down in the section you will find that the Navy Department is authorized to distribute every document that is printed for the use of that Department. Carrying the investigation still further you will find in broad terms, as I stated, that every Executive Department of the Government is left with the same powers of distribution as they have under present provisions of law.

Now, then, turn to section 63 of the bill and you will find that the members of this House and of the Senate alone have the power to conduct the distribution of their documents taken away from them, and that, too, in spite of the assurance of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] on yesterday, given, no doubt, under a misapprehension as to the provisions of the bill that is before us, actually taken away from the members of this body and the Senate and given to a superintendent of documents absolutely. That is to say, sir, when you examine the provisions of the bill they are directly in favor of leaving the Executive Departments as they are at present and taking away from the legislative department of the Government the power to distribute as they now have it. For what purpose can that be done or should it be done?

I had imagined, when I first read the bill, that there could be but one purpose in it.

For fifteen or twenty years past this House alone has been, of all the branches of the Government, under the control of the Democratic party. With the exception of a period of but four years every other department of the Government has been under the control of the Republican party, and this bill seeks to consolidate the power in the Republican party, through its management of the executive branch of the Government, to distribute the political literature of the country. It strikes me that the Democratic members of this joint committee have slept upon their political rights and are furthering a scheme, the object of which is to turn over to the Republican party a power and right which at present they do not possess, and in addition to those which they now have.

Think of it for a moment. With the power vested alone in the political party having charge of the Government to distribute its political literature it is impossible for any gentleman who gives the subject a moment's reflection to dismiss from his mind the idea that it will be done in behalf of the party to which this power is committed. How does it stand at present? Every member of the Senate or House has the authority to distribute Government publications as he pleases, and it can scarcely be questioned that they reach the people in a better way than they can possibly be reached under the provisions of this bill, for the reason that the different localities that give expression to their opinions through the election of members of this House speak as segregated localities, with different voices, and thereby enable themselves to have a different literature. But still further, and this is perhaps one of the most obnoxious features of the bill——

Mr. DICKERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question before he leaves that section?

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. DICKERSON. What part has this House, under that bill, in the selection of the superintendent of documents?

Mr. JOHNSTONE of South Carolina. I was just passing to that point. Now, turn to page 39. This, perhaps, is one of the most obnoxious features of the bill. Still pursuing the same line of building up the executive at the expense of the legislative branch of the Government, this bill proposes, in one of its most important features, not only to keep the American people, but to keep the representatives of the American people, in absolute ignorance of the conduct of the different Departments.

It provides therein that certain very important reports that are required by law to be made to this House shall not be printed at all unless the officer making the report deems it important to do it, or unless this House by special resolution requires it. Now, it strikes me that no more fundamental error could be committed by this House than to give to any Department of the Government the power to keep its transactions secret and within itself. By what means would we detect the imperfect or improper conduct of the affairs of any Department? Each member could only find it out by a personal inspection of the original papers, and that labor would be too great to be attempted by any one. Mark you, this provision too is in favor of the executive branch of the Government and at the expense of the legislative department.

Still further—and this has been alluded to, but only in one of its aspects, by the gentleman who last addressed the House—this joint committee is authorized to edit the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; a joint committee, composed in part of members of the Senate, another and a different house from ours, is absolutely invested with power, under this bill, to expunge from the RECORD the remarks of members of this House. Just think of the proposition in its baldest form: to give to a committee of the Senate the right to revise the proceedings of the House.

The argument can not be parried. This power is not vested in the representatives of the House on the joint committee, but is vested in the joint committee as a whole, and the Senators there voting have equal power with our representatives to expunge from the RECORD anything which they conceive to be objectionable which may be said here. There is a further objection to the bill, which is this: The members of this House, according to the recommendation of this joint committee, are to be sent to an official, in whose selection they have not one particle of influence, for the conduct of their own business. This superintendent of documents is to be an appointee of the President. He is to be confirmed by the Senate, and the members of this House are directed to go to him for the conduct of personal business—business in which they personally are concerned.

In what position will they stand? I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the important member so far as this House is concerned of this joint committee making this report, that he at least should have seen that the members of this House should have the power to appoint the man who is to do their business. Suppose he conducted this business in an unacceptable manner to us. What power of removal have we? We will have no power so far as his induction into office is concerned, and there he will stand, the agent of an adverse political party, the spokesman of adverse political sentiments, refusing to obey the will of the members of this House in regard to their own personal and official business. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected, perhaps, that when this matter was up for consideration yesterday I proposed to postpone the further consideration of this bill, saying that I regarded it as a very important bill. I have not changed my mind about it, and from what I have heard from the gentlemen who have spoken upon this question, I think it is very desirable that the bill should be considered, not only in open House, but that we should take this bill and read it by ourselves. It is an important measure, by which a large amount, in my opinion, can be saved without interfering with the interests or the rights of the people.

I think it is about the first opportunity we have had here to reduce the expenses of the Government; and the fact that there is a large accumulation of printed matter in the various rooms of this Capitol, matter which ought to have been distributed among the people, is an indication to my mind that we can do away with a great deal of the printing which has heretofore been done at great expense. I think that the committee is entitled to a great deal of credit for the labor which the members of it have bestowed upon that report; and when gentlemen come to consider the many things to be taken into consideration, I think they will give credit to that committee for having really performed a task that was neither very light nor very agreeable.

I do think that we might with propriety postpone the further consideration of this bill, say for a week or such a matter, in order that we could act understandingly; and that after the members of the House have read this bill they would be a great deal better prepared to act intelligently upon it. Although there are many things about this bill that I take exception to, and in which I agree with my friend from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN], and with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTONE], yet I think upon due examination and consideration by the members, these objections can be overcome and the bill perfected so that it will be satisfactory to the members of this House. And, as I stated before, there is evidently all through that bill, in my opinion, an effort upon the part of that committee to perform their duties; and I do think some of the criticisms that have been thrown out on the work of that committee are really uncalled for.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I move that the further discussion of this bill be postponed until a week from Wednesday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will permit me to say a word before he makes that motion.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in reply to the speeches that have been made by gentlemen on the floor, having no personal feeling in regard to the consideration of this bill; but I regret to see gentlemen taking so extreme a view of some of the provisions of the bill and hurling anathemas at the entire bill because some of its sections fail to meet with their approval.

Now, if it be true that some sections are subject to the criticisms that have been generously made by members, I ask the House not to reject the entire framework, and not to reject the bill because of objections that might obtain properly possibly to some sections or items in the bill; but when the bill is open for amendment under the five-minute rule, as it will be, and as each item comes up to be considered, the defects which have been kindly pointed out may be removed by amendment in the House if it sees fit to make such correction.

Now, then, my friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] starts out with a statement which is that section 32 abolishes the branch printing offices.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I said it turns them over to the Public Printer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; my friend said that that section of the bill abolishes the branch printing offices.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. The gentleman knew what I meant. It puts them under the control of the Public Printer, does it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, the whole of the law in the Revised Statutes provides that all the printing of this Government shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except as otherwise provided by law.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no provision of law for the little offices I speak of—one in the Weather Bureau, one in the Surgeon-General's Office, and several others that I included in my remarks yesterday.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. That in the Census Bureau?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, what we desire is that if there is to be public printing that public printing shall be done in the Public Printing Office, or under the supervision of the Public Printer.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Will the gentleman pardon me for an interruption.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. The gentleman omits the Census Office. The gentleman desires to transfer that branch office to the control of the Public Printer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire that all the printing of the Government, that is, the bill provides that all the printing of the Government, the public printing, shall be under the supervision of the officer created to attend to the public printing of the Government. This is right, it seems to me. I can not see why the Superintendent of the Census should have a printing office set up in his department any more than that the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries should have one, or the Civil Service Commission, or the Weather Bureau, or the Secretary of State, or the other seven executive officers of the Government.

Why is it these offices shall not be under the supervision of the Public Printer? It can not be that there is any difference in politics, I would suggest to my friend, because the Public Printer is supposed to be in accord and sympathy with the Administration, whatever the Administration may be, politically speaking. The Superintendent of the Census is very apt to be in harmony politically with the head of the Government, or the Chief Magistrate of the Government.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me just a word at this point?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Most cheerfully.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. If I understood my friend from Missouri, when he was on his feet, he intimated pretty broadly, as he usually does, that the Government Printer was back of this bill. I want to say to him that my understanding is he has taken no special interest in this measure. He is indifferent to it, excepting as he is not indifferent to anything that Congress may desire.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Then that is a magnificent illustration of mind-reading.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Tennessee on that point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to stating the connection of the Public Printer with this bill. He was summoned as a witness before the joint committee. He gave his testimony. It appears there in a modest way, as he is a modest gentleman; and since that time he has never appeared before the joint committee, so far as I know, and I think I have been at all the meetings of the committee, except perhaps two or three. He has made no suggestions, and has had no conference with the committee, and so far as I know, this bill does not bear a single solitary suggestion made by the Public Printer, except as it will be found in his printed testimony. But, that by the way.

But, Mr. Speaker, to go back to the branch office of the Census Bureau. I said that it ought to be under the supervision of the Public Printer. I do not care what party is in control of the Government the public printing ought to be under the control of the Public Printer.

Mr. WISE. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not true that the branch printing offices in the State, War and Navy, and Interior Departments are all under the supervision of the Public Printer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, the branch printing offices in the Treasury, in the Interior Department, and in two other Departments are already under control of the Public Printer.

Mr. WISE. The State and Navy Departments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, in the State and Navy Departments. This bill simply provides that the Public Printer shall furnish the material to these branch offices in order that the public printing may be done methodically and uniformly.

Now, my friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] goes on and makes some criticisms, kindly criticisms I hope, of section 46. He says the word "workmen" is left out, while the words "printers and binders" are inserted. Section 46 provides as follows:

> It shall be the duty of the Public Printer to employ printers and binders who are thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by trial of their skill under his direction.

Now, that seems to cover all that is necessary. The word "workmen" would apply, for example, to a man who stands as a watchman at the door, and I do not see why it is necessary to provide that he shall be "skilled" in that profession, if it be a profession. The committee were of opinion that the words "printers and binders" were sufficient to cover the classes of workmen who would be required to be thoroughly skilled in their occupations.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. A law passed on July 31, 1876, provides that no "workmen" shall be employed who are not thoroughly skilled. That is the law, and there must have been some reason for departing from it in this bill. There are other "workmen" besides the watchmen at the doors; there are janitors, copyholders, pressmen, carpenters, machinists, and others.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman that if the section is open to the criticism that he makes, if, when we reach that section, he will propose an amendment, he will find me advocating it with him. But I do not want, and I hope he does not want, to cut down the whole tree because one little twig may have a rotten leaf upon it. If the gentleman wants it to be amended in that respect, I assure him that he will not meet any opposition from me, but I insist that a defect like that is no reason why the whole bill should be rejected and the earnest, assiduous, the anxious efforts of the committee for nine months past to bring about a reform in this matter be set at naught.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will ask the gentleman whether, if we should fail to adopt the provision in section 62 for the appointment of a superintendent, all the remainder of the bill would not go by the board?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all. That provision is wholly independent. I will come to that in a moment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my excellent friend from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN], whom I admire so much and whose ability I appreciate so highly, made some humorous, and possibly some unfair, criticisms upon this bill. He spoke of the undue power which it proposes to give to the Senate committee. I attempted to explain that during his remarks, but I refer to it now again because I felt that I was trespassing upon the gentleman's time, and therefore could not do justice to the subject. The bill does propose to give the Senate Committee on Printing authority to do certain things when there is no House Committee on Printing. I have stated the reason for that. During a certain period there is no House Committee on Printing, and there is always some routine business which ought to be transacted by the joint committee.

We thought, therefore, that there could be no harm in permitting the Senate Committee on Printing to exercise this power until the House committee was appointed.

But, Mr. Speaker, if, at any time, it should appear to the House that the Senate committee were doing anything which they should not do, then the Speaker could at once appoint his Committee on Printing, which could meet with the Senate Printing Committee as the joint committee, so that I do not think that provision is so dangerous as my friend from Michigan thought, or seemed to think, it was. But, if it is thought to be dangerous, that provision can be struck out of the bill entirely without injury to the general scheme. Again, my friend criticised the section of the bill which gives the joint committee control of the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The language is "arrangement and style." My friend certainly cannot judicially say that that means that this committee is to have power to "edit" the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to strike out one solitary word of any speech which he or any gentleman may make upon this floor.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Read what it says about "reducing bulk."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; and I will show the gentleman what that refers to. The committee recognized the fact that the RECORD has become too voluminous.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The question is not what the committee intended, but what may be done under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, Mr. Speaker, we must construe the language of the bill fairly, and the language is that they may superintend and have control of "the arrangement and style" of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order to prevent unnecessary bulk. It does not provide that they can cut down a speech which is made upon this floor, either by my friend from Michigan (who always makes his speeches so admirably) or by any other member.

But, as I say, the RECORD is becoming voluminous; it is getting too large. Upon that point we have heard a good deal of testimony, and I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I refer to some of it. One of the official reporters was called before the committee with a view of obtaining testimony from a practical expert upon this subject, and I ask attention to a portion of his statement in regard to the unnecessary bulk of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I read:

As to the duplication of motions referred to above; this is a matter which should be left largely to the discretion of the reporters. Perhaps it would be more proper to speak of this as the "repetition of motions" by the presiding officer of either House, as, for instance:

"Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business."

"Mr. ANDERSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar."

The latter statement in each case being entirely accurate but utterly superfluous. Manifestly it would be enough to say in either case:

"The motion was agreed to," or "The motion was rejected," as warranted by the facts.

A further reduction could be made in the volume of the daily RECORD by abbreviating certain forms of stating the business, which have prevailed, without any apparent good reason, for many years. An instance of this may be cited in the House proceedings, where a bill or resolution is passed and the ordinary motion is made to reconsider and lay on the table. It is customary to state this as follows:

"The bill (or joint resolution) was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was according read the third time and passed.

"Mr. SAUNDERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill (or joint resolution) was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

"The latter motion was agreed to."

This form takes up six lines of the RECORD, and is repeated many thousands of times during a session. It would seem that a statement similar to this would be sufficient:

"The bill was engrossed, read a third time, and passed," or, simply, "The bill was engrossed and passed," or, "The engrossed bill was read a third time and passed; its reconsideration, on motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, being tabled."

This gentleman then recites other instances of the same kind. Let me give a further illustration.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Allow me this suggestion. The gentleman from Tennessee is giving his idea as to how the RECORD should be made up. There may come another Committee on Printing who may think the forms of statement should be longer or should be in some way different.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman is right in his suggestion, let him move an amendment to add right here to this section the words "but they shall not take one word from the uttered speech of any member of Congress." We will agree to that; there will be no controversy about it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I think the gentleman misapprehended the point of what I said. He has given a specimen of how he thinks the RECORD could be improved; somebody else may have a different idea. My objection is that the matter is necessarily left to somebody's discretion. The gentleman's discretion takes the direction which he now indicates; somebody else's discretion may take another direction.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We will fix this matter, with the gentleman's assistance, so that there can be no exercise of discretion which will do any injury to any member of Congress.

Now, one other illustration and I will pass from this subject. Take the single matter of motions to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table. Every measure passed in this House, I believe, without exception, is followed by a motion to reconsider and a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. Now, listen further to the statement of this gentleman:

Take the single item of "reconsideration," referred to on page 4, and apply it only to the bills and joint resolutions passed by the last Congress (and I refer now to House proceedings alone), and leaving entirely out of the count the thousands of times when this form is used with reference to simple motions, resolutions, or routine matters, or even amendments, and we find as follows:

Bills and joint resolutions which have actually become laws	2,189
Six lines of the RECORD to reconsideration of each	6
Giving a total number of lines of	13,134

or 131½ columns of the RECORD.

Do you desire that the RECORD shall be made voluminous by this kind of matter? If so, take away from the Committee on Printing or from the stenographers the power simply to make this little reduction; allow the matter to remain as it is, and you have 131 columns of the RECORD in a single session occupied with the statement of these motions to reconsider and the tabling of them.

When to this is added the myriad number of times this form is used in reference to bills which do not become laws, to simple motions, or resolutions, etc., the number of columns will be largely more than doubled, and when there is also appended the duplication of motions, and the various other unnecessary forms, or rather redundant forms, of stating business in the House and in Committee of the Whole, this number will be at least quadrupled.

Mr. WALKER. I would like to ask the gentleman how much the committee estimate would have been saved in the matter of printing if the bill now proposed had been in operation as law during the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not undertake to make any estimate of that kind. I spoke of that matter yesterday; and the gentleman will find in my printed remarks what I had to say on the question of reduction of expense.

Mr. WALKER. What would be the reduction?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Very large; I do not know how to estimate it in dollars and cents. But the advantage is not simply in dollars and cents; it is in having a methodical and orderly system of laws on this subject, to which easy reference can be had.

Mr. WALKER. I understood there had been an estimate given by some member of the committee as to the saving that will be made by this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A rough estimate was made; the saving may be all the way from $400,000 to $500,000. I can not undertake to be accurate as to the figures.

Mr. HATCH. Is there anything in any existing law that will prevent the person now having charge of the matter from adopting the suggestions which are made in the report as to abridging the statements in regard to the ordinary business of the House to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Upon that point I will say that there is no written law upon the subject; but there is a custom which has been followed in this House for a hundred years.

Mr. HATCH. If there is no existing law on the subject, why is there any need of legislating now?

Mr. RICHARDSON. In order to get rid of a custom which has come to have almost the force of law.

Mr. HATCH. Can we not simply instruct the officer having this matter in charge?

Mr. RICHARDSON. By whom shall he be instructed?

Mr. HATCH. Well, we can adopt a resolution in half a dozen lines.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We propose to give instruction of that kind in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. HATCH. But why not pass a simple resolution? What need is there for passing a bill with a hundred sections in it to do what can be accomplished in a dozen lines?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The suggestion of the gentleman would apply to only one of the reforms proposed.

Mr. HATCH. I suggest to the gentleman that he might very well have taken a little of his own medicine in preparing his bill. Instead of a bill of one hundred sections, it seems to me we might have had one of three or four sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman may be right about the fact that there are too many sections. I do not undertake to say that if we had had the wisdom and experience of my friend from Missouri we might, and probably would, have had a better bill; but I do hope that we will have his assistance when we come to consider it by items.

Mr. HATCH. Well, I have not been able to find anything in the bill yet, nor have I heard anything in the presentation of the case by the gentleman himself which would warrant me in voting for any of its provisions. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. I am sorry that the bill does not please him, and had hoped that he would at least give us his valuable assistance in perfecting it. The gentleman from Missouri will understand that there are many provisions of the bill. Some of them do not change existing law. Some of these, in fact the most of them, have been in existence for thirty years.

Mr. HATCH. If the provisions of the bill do not change existing law why put them in?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was necessary, in many instances, in order to make the bill complete as a whole. The report shows in every case the reason.

Mr. HATCH. But I can not see any reason for enacting a law that is already in force.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman would take the trouble to examine the report——

Mr. HATCH. I have heard a part of it read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. HATCH. I have not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman states that he has heard a part of the report read. It has not been read on the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I will state to the gentleman that I have simply heard extracts from the report read, but I have not read it myself, and I do not think that I will get time between now and the adjournment of this session to read it. I will have to become more interested in the bill than I am now to induce me to do that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I submit that the gentleman ought not to criticise something that he has not either read or heard read, for this report has certainly not been read in the House.

Mr. PICKLER. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this bill reduces the number of agricultural reports printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does.

Mr. PICKLER. To what extent?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It reduces the number from 400,000 to 300,000.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the object of reducing the number of agricultural reports printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman that the reason is simply this: The supply is much greater than the demand. We print 400,000 copies of the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, which costs $200,000, or 50 cents a copy. But any gentleman who wants a copy can go into one of the second-hand bookstores in this city where they are for sale and buy them at from 4 to 10 cents a copy. Now, if there is a demand for a book costing 50 cents, it certainly could not be purchased readily at a cost of from 4 to 10 cents.

Mr. PICKLER. That may be applicable to some portions of the country, but it is not so in the district I represent. I could well distribute five times the number I receive.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is applicable to the District of Columbia, at all events.

Mr. ENLOE. The trouble is in the distribution, not in the number printed.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, as the gentleman from Tennessee suggests, the trouble is in the distribution and not in the publication.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be so.

Mr. PICKLER. Now I would like the gentleman to discuss the matter that I raised on yesterday afternoon. That is, why it is better to turn over these documents for distribution to a superintendent rather than to distribute them through the members of the House as now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will give the gentleman the reasons which influenced the committee in framing this portion of the bill. But first let me say that the general complaint has been that there is too much printing, and consequently a great waste of public money in that way. It occurred to the committee that we would recommend to Congress these reductions. I know of no other way to reduce the cost except to print fewer of these documents. We did not confine the reduction to the agricultural reports alone, but applied it to all Government publications almost without exception.

The effort was to economize in the public printing generally. If Congress did not wish to do so, if it wishes to print 400,000 copies of the Report on Agriculture instead of the number recommended by the committee, when we come to consider that item we can strike out 300,000 and insert 400,000, and no material harm will be done to the bill. But, as I have said, it occurred to us that if we were to begin to economize, why it was necessary to start the economy somewhere, and we believed it could well be done by printing fewer of these documents.

Now, I recur to the other question to which the gentleman has referred, and will then conclude, because I do not wish to weary the House—that is, upon the question of the distribution of what is printed. I said yesterday that it was before this committee in testimony that one man had procured 40 copies of a valuable publication. We did not think that this practice ought to exist, and the only way to remedy it was for some one person to see to whom documents were sent, in order that he might inform members of Congress that their distribution was being duplicated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was not the intention to prevent duplication if any member wishes to duplicate, but simply to give you notice that the order you send is a duplicate one, if it be so, and permit you to withdraw it or send the document if you wished. That is to say, you have that right, and the absolute right, to send it if you choose. Now, gentlemen come forward and say that they are not willing their documents or lists of documents should pass under the supervision of an appointee of the President of the United States. That is not a sufficient objection to the method to justify a member in voting against it, if the method itself is right. You can remedy that by an amendment to the bill, and it will not meet with serious objections on my part. I myself would prefer that the man who distributes or exercises the supervision over the lists of members should be a creature of Congress.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not here to put any supervision over members of Congress in any lists or in any distribution of any documents. Let us have then a creature of Congress, if it is thought best. If it would not be considered immodest I might suggest that the Joint Committee on Printing might select you a suitable man as superintendent of documents, or any other committee would probably do as well.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry? What is the objection to putting it, as now, with the Doorkeeper elected by the House to select the superintendent?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is just the difficulty, where you have one in the Senate and one in the House, the House is powerless to know what is being done in the Senate document room.

Mr. HEARD. But that is just precisely what we want, and it it has worked satisfactorily.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Besides there is nobody charged with the distribution of departmental printing.

Mr. HEARD. So far as that is concerned I do not think it is a matter of very serious importance to us. But this provision is dealing with the distribution of documents that belong to the members of the House and are controlled by them. There is no complaint of that now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It might be, Mr. Speaker, that we could reach an agreement by which the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] could be embodied, that is that the documents of members should be distributed entirely without submitting lists or anything else to the superintendent. But the object we had in view was to get rid of the vast accumulation, the vast surplus of documents now existing in the various Departments. There is not an Executive Department of this Government that is not to-day flooded with extra documents that do not belong to members of Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have you state to the House whether or not, in your opinion, section 67 of this bill takes from the House of Representatives the power it now has to appoint its own employés? I refer to page 28, section 67, the latter clause.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think there was ever any intention on the part of the committee that this superintendent of documents should appoint the officers of the House document room. If the section has that effect it can go out of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like, for the information of the House, to read the latter clause of this section:

> The superintendent of documents shall appoint all employés authorized by Congress.

Now, I would like to have the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] state what construction he puts upon that clause; whether, in his opinion, the superintendent of documents, under this provision of the bill, will not be authorized to appoint all the employés authorized by Congress in connection with the service of this House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will give you a frank answer upon that. I ask you to read section 75, which says:

> There shall be one folding room of the Senate and one folding room of the House of Representatives. They shall be in charge of superintendents, appointed, respectively, by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and Doorkeeper of the House, who shall also appoint the necessary assistants.

Now, if there is any inconsistency the other provisions may be stricken out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman reads very well, but he does not go far enough. He should read the remainder.

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing to read).

All reports or documents to be distributed for Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be folded and distributed from the folding rooms under the general direction of the superintendent of documents, and whenever, in his opinion, it is advisable to fold and distribute any documents from the Government Printing Office or the storehouses connected therewith he shall so order.

We are upon the question of the appointment of these officers, and it expressly says that the Doorkeeper shall appoint the superintendent and the necessary officers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has invited my attention to section 75 of this bill, and I undertake to say that that section provides that the superintendent of documents may absolutely discontinue the folding room of this House and order all documents for the use of Congress to be distributed from the printing office or from storehouses whenever he pleases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If it would save time I do not see that anybody would be hurt; but I say this, Mr. Speaker, that if the gentleman wants to strike it out it can go out of the bill. I want it understood that we desire the distribution of our documents to be under the absolute control——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of the members of this House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of the members of this House, through the Doorkeeper and the assistants appointed by the Doorkeeper for the purpose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And that is the law now, and this bill seeks to change it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It may remain the law, if the gentleman desires it and the House desires it. We have provided a different method possibly, but we do provide, as I insisted in the beginning, that the Doorkeeper shall appoint the superintendent, and he shall appoint his assistants.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But all under the supervision of the superintendent of documents.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We will not quarrel about that, because I concede that if it is open to any criticism such as the gentleman makes, I will not object to an amendment to make it just as he desires it.

Mr. HEARD. That will be all right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But do you not admit the correctness of my criticism and construction of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; I do not agree with you, because there are two provisions in the bill, and you would have to construe the bill with both provisions before you.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The trouble with the bill in my opinion is, if the gentleman will pardon me, that it conflicts all the way through.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Perhaps there may be conflicting provisions in it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I for one am opposed to every line and section in it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then the gentleman is opposed to about three-fourths of the provisions of the Revised Statutes on the subject, which are copied bodily into this bill, and that shows that the gentleman does not mean all he says when he says that, but that he is joking.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee indulge me for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman spoke a few moments ago of the large number of documents remaining in the basement of the Capitol; I would like him to explain how those documents have accumulated there?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That I will explain to the gentleman in a moment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it not a fact that all documents sent to the Capitol are assigned to members of the House? Now, if any member of the House should die, or shall leave the House and shall leave documents to his credit, is it not required that they shall be placed to the credit of his successor? Now, my question is, why it is that documents remaining in the Capitol have not been passed to the credit of the successor of each member of the House from that district?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this large accumulation of documents of which I have made mention comes about in this way: From time to time in the past twenty or thirty years, and possibly longer, these documents and books have accumulated in the various committee rooms of this Capitol. They have increased in excessive numbers in the Library, and in order to make room for other and possibly more valuable volumes they have from time to time been transferred from the committee rooms and have met with a resting place in the vaults and basement of this Capitol. I would also state that the lowest estimate made is that there are 200,000 volumes there that do not belong, and never did belong, to the quotas of members of Congress.

The same trouble exists in the Senate, and to a greater degree there, because it is true that many Senators, as I learned, and as was shown by the proof, did not send out public documents at all, but permitted them to lapse. They permit them to remain there in the document room until they are finally transferred to the basement of the Capitol, and there they remain to nobody's quota. It is not in proof possibly in the testimony, but was mentioned by an officer of the Senate who has charge of these documents, and the names of quite a number of Senators were given who never sent out documents. Some of them died years and years ago, and their quotas were eventually put in the basement or cellar and there have remained, and they enter into this accumulation.

Of course that is an exception to the statement I made a moment ago, when I said that none of them belonged to the quotas of members of Congress. I do not believe that there are any of that surplus or accumulation that ever belonged to members of the House; but the facts are that some of them did belong to the quotas of Senators. Still they do represent the surplus that has accumulated.

Mr. DINGLEY. How does it happen that they have not been assigned to different members?

Mr. RICHARDSON. They were not assigned at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. How does it happen that these documents accumulated? Whenever a resolution is passed ordering the printing of any document or report, it provides that a certain number shall be printed for the use of the House, to be assigned in proportion, to each member a certain number, and a certain number for the Senate; and then the number not assigned is reserved for the House and Senate libraries.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that the bill provides further, that whenever in the division of documents among members there is a surplus over 25, that that surplus in excess of 25 shall go to this superintendent of documents. Now, take a number of documents printed during a session of Congress, and divide the number ordered by the House by the number of members—say 332—and if there is a remainder of 330 left, that remainder is not apportioned to members. Mr. Speaker, I ask attention of members to this statement. The report shows, that when you take this surplus, this remainder that is not assigned to members, in one Congress this surplus amounts to 40,000 books! Now, would you think that? This remainder left over, after division among the members is not apportioned to anybody. It is an accumulation here that finally seeks its resting place, as I stated before, in the basement of the Capitol. Now, when you take this remainder which is a fraction, it amounts in the long run to 45,000 volumes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would ask the gentleman, how does it happen that there should be such a distribution of books as to leave a surplus of 45,000, and why these 45,000 can not be equally divided among members?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Because, if the gentleman will notice, suppose there are 500 copies of something printed for the use of the House, and we have 335 members, that will give each member 1 copy and there will be a fraction, 165, left.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not refer to the printing of the smaller documents for the use of the House, but in the printing of reports and other printing which is of a larger character.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not speaking of reports. It is bound volumes I speak of; and these accumulated fractions will amount to 45,000 coming over from the Forty-ninth or Fiftieth Congress, I do not recollect which; but it is very large at each session of Congress. This surplus will go to this superintendent to be distributed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would say in further answer to the gentleman's question, as to how these books got into the basement of the Capitol, I do not know, but they have been there for years and years, and some of them are rotting and molding. But there they are, and they ought to be taken out and distributed among the people.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A friend near me suggests a remedy, to distribute them among the new members. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that. But there ought to be something done with them, and it occurred to the Joint Committee that if we had this superintendent of documents he could distribute them, and in the distribution the bill, as gentlemen will see, gives the preference to members of Congress.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman permit a question at this point?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROSIUS. Is any part of the surplus accumulation to which the gentleman refers due to the fact that books, which are to the credit of deceased members of the House, have never been sent out?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think so, because I think that wherever there have been quotas undistributed at the death of members, they have usually passed to their successors.

Mr. BROSIUS. That is the next question that I was going to ask. In some instances, I know, that has not been the case, and I would like to know, if the gentleman from Tennessee can give me the information, what disposition is made of the books of deceased members?

Mr. RICHARDSON. They go to their successors.

Mr. BROSIUS. Not always.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Perhaps not always. I am not prepared to say, because I have never investigated that matter. I do know, in regard to some deceased members of the House, that their documents were carried to their homes, upon the idea that they were the personal property of the members themselves; and if gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the law which apportions these books and documents I think he will find the better legal opinion to be that they do in fact belong to members individually. I know, of course, that the intention of the law is that the member shall hold them in trust for his constituents. That is certainly the intent and meaning of the law, and that ought to be the law.

Mr. BROSIUS. I have not any doubt as to the rightful ownership of these books or documents; what I am trying to find out is whether they ever reach their rightful owners. If in any particular case a member of this House goes to the folding room and makes inquiry upon this subject, he will be told that the accounts of the deceased member have been closed and that nothing stands to his credit. Now, that in all such cases the books have been sent to the personal representatives of the deceased member I do not believe, and if the gentleman can give me the information I would like to know what disposition is made of the documents in such cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I have never had occasion to make any inquiry upon that point except in an ordinary way as a member of the House, I am not prepared to give any information or opinion about it, further than to say that I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] is accurate when he says that it is always claimed that the account of the deceased member has been closed. I know that there are some instances in which the successors have got the undistributed balance of the quotas of deceased members.

Mr. BROSIUS. I did not mean to make my statement so broad as that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, one word more. The committee thought it was best to have this superintendent of documents appointed by the President. Gentlemen around me here seem to have a different idea. They seem to think that this superintendent ought to be the creature of Congress. I repeat that if on the further consideration of this bill it shall be deemed best to make that amendment, I shall not oppose it.

I am perfectly willing, even, that the distribution shall go on as it has done heretofore if the majority of this House and of the other House think that best; but I do know that there are crying evils and irregularities in this matter that ought to be remedied, and this committee has made a humble but earnest effort to suggest a plan for the correction of those evils and irregularities.

Mr. RAY. What is the objection to leaving the distribution of the documents belonging to a member of this House to himself, if he desires to make the distribution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I do not understand that there is any proposition to change that.

Mr. RAY. As I understand the bill, the distribution can only be done through a circumlocution office.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all.

Mr. RAY. The member must first send his list to this superintendent of documents, and then he must await the pleasure or convenience of this official until he gets his quota.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I repeat what I have already said in this discussion, that if it is the desire of the House I have no objection to amending the bill so as to provide in so many words that each member shall control in his own way the distribution of his own books and documents. There is no disposition on the part of this committee to interfere in the slightest degree with the free distribution by members of any document published by Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman tell us where the principal office of this superintendent of documents is to be—in the Interior Department or at the Capitol?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no provision made for that in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It may be in the Public Printing Office.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be a very good place for it; but there is no such provision in the bill for that. That is a matter that Congress can deal with. Congress might, if they saw fit, put this official where the books and documents are kept now.

Mr. DICKERSON. What remedy are we to have if this official fails to recognize our rights? If he should fail entirely to discharge his duty towards the members of this House, what power would they have to punish him? In other words, would not the entire control of this official be in the Senate and the President of the United States?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think there would be any such power in the Senate; the Senate would have no more power over this officer after he was appointed than the House would. But I will meet the gentleman's question frankly. If this officer neglected his duty—if there were any willful violation of duty on his part—the remedy would be to impeach him, and thus get rid of him, as you would do with any other officer of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. There seems to be no trouble about the distribution of the regular quota of documents given to each member; the only trouble seems to be to distribute the surplus. Now, can not this Congress and every succeeding Congress, provide by resolution for the distribution of the surplus just as well as would be done by having a regular officer to attend to the matter?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There would be no difficulty about that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I obtained the floor by the courtesy of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. MILLER], who had made a motion to postpone this bill until Wednesday of next week. I desire to say that the bill ought not to be set aside hurriedly, and it ought not to be passed upon hurriedly, as some gentlemen seem to think has been the desire of the committee. The bill ought to receive the fullest and freest discussion. Let us pass so much of it as is right, and strike out so much as is objectionable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentlemen of the House may have time to examine the bill and report properly, and I beg them to take time to do so, I renew the motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Wednesday of next week.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, considering that it will be easy to take the few features of reform that there may be in this bill, and to have a new bill framed by the Committee on Printing, and that the easiest way to dispose of the present bill is to kill it right here and now, I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri takes precedence of the motion to postpone. The question is on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. POWERS. What would be the effect of that motion?

Several MEMBERS. It kills the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The adoption of the motion, unless it should be reconsidered, would have the effect to kill the bill.

Mr. ENLOE. If this bill should be laid on the table will that action interfere in any way with the consideration of another bill on the same subject that may be brought in here later?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would not. There is no rule now existing by which that would be the effect.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri, there were—ayes 105, noes 58.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 42 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri to lay the bill on the table; and there were—yeas 140, nays 105, not voting 86; as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1892.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present resolutions recently adopted by Salem Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Salem, Oregon, in favor, first, of the United States Government becoming the principal owner or controller of the Nicaragua Canal, and of the Government advancing money and guarantying bonds in sufficient sums and in such manner as to finish that important work for use in the least possible time consistent with true economy; second, recommending that all public lands of the United States over 4,000 feet above the sea level be withdrawn from sale and settlement; and, third, as a measure of safety to such mountain lands and the interests of animal industry, that the lands be let for grazing purposes under the supervision of the Bureau of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture.

As the resolutions relate to two separate and distinct subjects, all in one paper, which is not separable, it can only go to one committee, of course. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of Mono Grange, No. 25, Patrons of Husbandry, of Oregon, and a petition of Coast Fork Grange, No. 243, Patrons of Husbandry, of Oregon, praying Congress to pass an act construing the late forfeiture act according to its original and true purpose, to forfeit all the lands within the 40-mile boundaries and between the terminal limits drawn at right angles with the general course of the unconstructed road for 25 miles next to said terminal; and also praying for the passage of an act resuming and restoring to the public domain all ands opposite to and coterminous with those portions of any railroad line not constructed within the time or according to the law under which they are claimed; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Benjamin Franklin Dowell, of Oregon, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services with the Oregon Volunteers in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Legislature of Washington, praying for the passage of a bill for the relief of Peter G. Stewart, of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLODGETT presented the petition of Rev. J. C. Mahan, pastor, and 140 members of the Second Methodist Episcopal Church of Rahway, N. J., and a petition of citizens of Flemingon, N.J., praying that the World's Columbian Exposition be closed on Sunday; which were referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

Mr. FELTON. I present a petition of the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce, of Eureka, Cal., praying that the full amount of $700,000 recommended by the Board of Engineers in charge of the improvement of Humboldt Bay be appropriated at an early date as possible.

It is an able presentation of the situation of that harbor, and gives convincing facts as to the necessity of such improvements and the urgency for immediate action on part of Congress, as, owing to climatic conditions, the spring and summer is the proper time for construction. Also, to prevent the shoaling of the river harbor the entire construction should be carried on at the same time; that such a course would require a larger appropriation at this time but combines the elements of safety and economy in the end.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FELTON. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for a new project for Government work at San Pedro, Cal., officially known as Wilmington Harbor, California.

In connection with this petition there are some very interesting facts which go to show that further appropriation should be expended upon that harbor. In the course of the two last decades $900,000 have been spent for the improvement of the harbor and the receipts in the last nine years from customs have been over $700,000. When the improvement was commenced there was but 18 inches of water on the bar at low tide, and now there is 14 feet of water in the inner harbor; according to the report of the engineers it can be further deepened to from 26 to 28 feet low tide. San Pedro is the only entry port to that great and fertile part of the southern portion of the State of California; the harbor is not only necessary for commerce, but as a harbor of refuge—it being the only safe harbor on the coast for 400 miles north and 200 south.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a petition numerously signed by members of Minier Grange, No. 214, Patrons of Husbandry, of Little Mackinaw Township, Tazewell County, Ill., praying that post-office facilities be extended to farmers as well as other people. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present the memorial of a considerable number of bankers and national-banking institutions of the city of New Orleans, La., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 685, relating to the purchase and sale of cotton, etc. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT presented a petition of the Denver (Colo.) Real Estate and Stock Exchange, praying for the passage of the bill providing for coinage at the Denver mint; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], as the bill was introduced by him, to the fact that the Committee on Interstate Commerce authorized me to report the bill back and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce instead of Interstate Commerce.

The report was agreed to.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1742) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1743) for the relief of the legal representatives of William D. Wilson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1744) for the relief of Audley C. Britton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT. I have been requested by the Delegate from New Mexico to introduce a bill to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. I wish to say that in introducing the bill, I do so at the request of the Delegate, and without in anyway committing myself to the provisions of the bill.

The bill (S. 1745) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1746) granting a pension to Benjamin Franklin Dowell, of Oregon, for services with the Oregon Volunteers in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1747) granting a pension to Charles W. Hammond; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1748) granting a pension to Mrs. Janet L. P. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1749) to make an appropriation for the procurement of sites for defenses of the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 1750) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 2 miles north and 2 miles south of the city of Leavenworth, in the county of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1751) for the relief of Augusta De Alna; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1752) for the relief of W. A. Walker, of Albuquerque, N. Mex.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1753) to remove charges of desertion in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1754) for the relief of Herbert Cushman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 1755) to amend certain sections of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to carry into effect certain recommendations of the United States delegates to the International Marine Conference; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. This is an exceedingly important bill, covering the recommendations made at that maritime congress, as many by the congress itself as were applicable to our country, and also those made by the United States delegates to the congress, and many of the bills were considered by the Committee on Commerce. The matters were, however, so very important and so complicated that the committee preferred that there should be another board which should pass upon the recommendations, and a request was made by the Senate to the Secretary of the Treasury that he would appoint a board to take into consideration during vacation all those recommendations. He appointed a board of very accomplished officers indeed. They have spent a great deal of time, months of labor, and exceedingly careful labor, too, I judge from the results, and this bill is the fruit of their labors. They have also sent in a statement of reasons for certain recommendations. The bill was sent to various boards of trade and mercantile and maritime associations, and their criticisms have been received in reply. All this matter is necessary for the consideration of this bill by the Committee on Commerce. Therefore I ask that the reasons of the board and the various reasons given in the papers I hold in my hand may be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be printed as a document, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that a day or two ago a report was made from the Secretary of the Treasury—and I desire to call the attention of the Senator to it—in response to a resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to this same matter.

Mr. FRYE. No; that covered a question of no very great importance, the use of life-saving projectiles, etc., for steamers.

Mr. COCKRELL. It did not relate to the subject-matter to which the Senator here refers?

Mr. FRYE. No; this covers the whole maritime interests of the country, changes to be made in lights, rules of the sea, etc. It is very important indeed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not be better to have the bill printed separately?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the documents separately?

Mr. FRYE. I prefer to have them printed separately, the documents all in one book, both separately.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the documents be printed in one volume.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1756) to carry out certain findings of the Quartermaster-General and the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WASHBURN introduced a bill (S. 1757) defining options and futures and imposing special taxes on dealers therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COLQUITT, it was Ordered, That the papers of Clara Morris be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRINTING OF BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Public Printer is hereby instructed to print 5,000 copies of Senate bill 1694, and send them to the Senate document room.

Mr. PERKINS. If there is no objection I ask for the consideration of the resolution now. If there is, of course I consent that the resolution may go to the Committee on Printing. I will state that it is a resolution providing for printing extra copies of what is known as the Torrey bankruptcy bill, and while the type is in form I thought it was best that the resolution should be considered.

Mr. MANDERSON. What is the number that it is proposed to print?

Mr. PERKINS. Five thousand copies.

Mr. MANDERSON. I presume that would be under the limit of $500, but I think the law is imperative that such resolutions shall be referred. We will take speedy action on it.

Mr. PERKINS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

STENOGRAPHER FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer to report hearings before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

INDIAN AGENCIES.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate any information in the Department upon the question of dispensing with any of the Indian agencies estimated for in the estimates for the next fiscal year, and the conclusions of the Department upon the feasibility of dispensing with any and how many of such agencies.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GRAND HAVEN, MICH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, that order is closed, and the Calendar will be taken up. The first bill on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

The bill (S. 377) to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Grand Haven, in the State of Michigan, was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation as to the population of this place and the necessity for a public building there, and as to whether there is any United States court held there, or any United States offices other than the post-office.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I will state that at Grand Haven, Mich., there is a custom-house. The chief office of the life-saving stations for the eleventh district, covering that whole lake coast, is there. The weather signal office is there. The office of the United States engineers in charge of all harbors on the east side of the lake is there. The office of the local engineer in charge of Grand Haven Harbor, and the office of the superintendent of all the light-houses on the east shore of Lake Michigan are there. The office of inspectors of hulls of all steam vessels of that district is there. The office of inspector of boilers is there. The office of surgeon of the Marine Hospital Service for that district is there.

I will state that the Government now pays expensive rent for all the offices named, which are mostly of a limited capacity, and the fire risk is very great for all the records in those offices. The bill passed the Senate in the last Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the population of the city?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The population of Grand Haven is about 6,000, but the business of the place, gathering all these offices there pertaining to the east side of the lake, makes the erection of this building very proper in my judgment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DEADWOOD, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 436) to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Deadwood, in the State of South Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill. Is there any court held there? What is the population of the city, and what justifies this building?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Deadwood is one of the three places in the State of South Dakota where terms of the United States district court are held. The Government is paying for offices of the court and for the courtroom about $4,000 a year, and $1,000 rent for a post-office building. The population of Deadwood itself is about 4,000, but it is the center of several towns, so that within a radius of 5 miles there is a population of over 15,000 people.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DOVER, N. H.

The bill (S. 368) to provide for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a public building thereon, at Dover, in the State of New Hampshire, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no report from the Senate committee accompanying the bill, I suppose solely for the reason that the committee concluded to omit to make reports in cases where bills had passed the Senate several times. This bill has passed the Senate I think three times at least, and I am not certain but that it has passed four times. It has been reported favorably in the House of Representatives, and I have in my hand Report No. 1528, Fifty-first Congress, first session, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, which states fully the reasons why that committee deemed it justifiable to make an appropriation for a public building in Dover, N. H.

Dover is a large manufacturing city, and is a rapidly-growing city, full of enterprise, and, as has been conceived by the Senate on three occasions and by the committee of the other House, is entitled to this appropriation for a public building. I believe if any public-building bills are to pass this bill is one that should pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the population of Dover?

Mr. CHANDLER. The population was stated in the report of the other House to be 15,000. I think the population is about 2,000 more, probably about 17,000. There are no suitable post-office accommodations there, and this building, I beg leave to assure the Senator from Missouri, is very much needed by the city. I am perfectly willing to take my full responsibility of voting for the bill, and I trust that the Senator from Missouri will make no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT STILLWATER, MINN.

The bill (S. 687) for the erection of a public building at Stillwater, Minn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of the necessity for this building and something about the population of the place, whether United States courts are held there, and what United States offices are there.

Mr. WASHBURN. A bill precisely like this passed the Senate at the last session of Congress. Stillwater is the fourth largest city in Minnesota. It is a very important manufacturing town, the population of which according to the last census I do not precisely remember, but it is somewhere from eighteen to twenty thousand. I think this bill is as meritorious as any which has passed the Senate during this session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, one word. I am not going to make any opposition to the passage of this bill, but it seems that in all of these bills one of the principal arguments for their passage now is that at the last Congress, the celebrated Fifty-first Congress, these bills were passed through the Senate. It is remarkable that they did not get through the House of Representatives. With the proneness of that Congress to make appropriations, I do not think it is a sufficient argument simply to say that a particular bill passed the Senate at the last session and failed in the other House, because certainly that House was recognized as rather liberal in the appropriations it made during that Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SALEM, OREGON.

The bill (S. 534) to provide for the construction of a public building at Salem, Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I should like to hear some explanation of this bill before it is passed. Is this bill for Salem, Oregon, one of the old bills, one that has been passed by the Senate heretofore? I desire to know what is the necessity for it.

Mr. DOLPH. A similar bill was passed, I think three times, certainly at least twice, by the Senate, but failed to receive favorable consideration by the other House.

Salem is the capital of the State. It contains some fine State buildings, a capitol building, an insane asylum, and other public buildings, costly and ornamental to the city. It is now in the second district of Oregon, and there is not a Federal public building in the district.

The population is about 10,000. The business of the post-office authorized the free-delivery system some years ago, and I suppose the proceeds of the office are from $15,000 to $20,000 a year. The accommodations are at present very poor. It would cost to rent in a proper location a suitable building more than the interest on the money required to erect a building. I think there can be no possible objection to the bill. As I have said, it has passed the Senate, I think three times, at least twice.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT THE DALLES, OREGON.

The bill (S. 601) for the erection of a public building for a post-office and United States land-office at the city of The Dalles, Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I think that it is high time that some inquiry were made touching the location of public buildings at unimportant towns over the country. I see there is no report accompanying this bill, and so far as I am informed the Senate has not been advised as to the necessity for a public building to cost $100,000 in a town in a remote State, where the population is less than 1,000 according to the last census.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Senator is wholly misinformed.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have examined the census report.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is evidently quoting the population of one precinct or ward of the city of The Dalles. The city of The Dalles is the metropolis of Eastern Oregon. It is the principal city in that great section of the State which contains more territory, as far as that is concerned, than all the New England States put together, including New Jersey.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is outside of New England.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; New Jersey is outside of New England. The Dalles has in the neighborhood of about 5,000 actual population in the city proper, and a large population, I suppose ten or fifteen thousand, within a radius of a few miles around it. It is the entrepôt of the trade of that country. Millions of pounds of wool from that great section come in there annually, also large quantities of wheat. It has some three or four newspapers. I think it has one daily and three or four weeklies. It has also three or four national banks and several private banks. There is an immense amount of business done there annually. It is in a Congressional district other than Salem, for which an appropriation was made a few minutes ago of $100,000. The principal land office in the State is located at The Dalles.

Another matter that it may be proper to state, is the fact that the whole of the State of Oregon is now in one judicial district, the court being located in Portland. It is evident that there must be a division of that State at a very early date and another district established. That, of course, is in the future, but that it is bound to come in a very short time I have no doubt. As the matter stands now, the city of The Dalles is a place of considerable importance. There are machine shops located there in connection with the great corporations doing business along the railroads and on the river, there is a large transient population coming and going, and a large, steady, and rapidly increasing amount of business done there every year.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Oregon for his explanation, but still I am not convinced.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I notice in looking over the census report that there is some mistake in regard to the population of The Dalles. The population is between four and five thousand in the city itself, as shown by the last census

Mr. McPHERSON. Then it shows clearly, among other things, that the late census is not an infallible document. I believe complaint has been made in some other parts of the country with regard to the imperfections of the census report. This charge seems to find justification at The Dalles as well as elsewhere. I have looked in the census report and I find as to cities of 1,000 population and over that The Dalles is not mentioned at all. There is no information whatever as to the necessity of a public building for a post-office there——

Mr. MITCHELL. That is evidently a mistake.

Mr. McPHERSON. In a city of 5,000 people, the number claimed by the Senator from Oregon to exist in the city, there is no claim that there is need for a court building, if I understand the Senator, or for any other purpose except a land office and a post-office.

There are many cities in the East with a population anywhere from 50,000 to 100,000, in which no public building has been erected for a post-office or for any other public purpose by the Government of the United States. There can only be a limited amount of money appropriated each year and used intelligently and judiciously in the construction of public buildings. I submit if it is not wisdom on the part of this Government to erect public buildings in cities having now a large population, having a steady and healthy growth, as many of the cities of the East have, instead of at The Dalles.

We appeal here to the Congress of the United States for buildings for post-offices, for court purposes, for internal-revenue officers, and for custom-houses in many of the eastern cities, and we do not get appropriations of money for those places. But you go to the State of Oregon and anticipate a city which is to spring up there in the future with a population sufficient to justify the appropriation proposed of $100,000. You have not yet reached the time when the necessity for $100,000 investment is apparent. These appropriations can not be unlimited, though a certain amount of money may be appropriated each year for public buildings. I should be glad to see the time come when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would discriminate between these applications for public buildings and appropriate for them first where they are to accommodate the greatest number, and where they should be first built.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I will only say a word. The fact that Oregon is a remote State, as was stated by the Senator from New Jersey, I suppose ought not to cut much figure in the case.

I hold in my hand a communication from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury recommending this appropriation. I also have in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitted by the Secretary of the Interior, showing the large amount of business done in the land office at The Dalles, which I shall ask to have inserted in my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers referred to by the Senator from Oregon will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The papers are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1890.

SIR: The letter from your committee, dated December 14, 1889, requested such information as I may have and my opinion in regard to the advisability of Senate bill 406, introduced December 4, 1889, by Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL, to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building for the accommodation of the post-office, United States land office, etc., in The Dalles, Oregon, at a cost not to exceed $150,000, becoming a law.

In reply, I have the honor to submit the following:

Copy of a report, dated February 20, 1890, addressed to this office by the postmaster of The Dalles, Oregon;

Copy of a report, dated December 17, 1889, addressed to this office by the honorable the Acting Postmaster-General;

Copy of a report, dated January 22, 1890, addressed to this office by the honorable the Secretary of the Interior; and

Copy of a report, dated January 16, 1890, addressed to this office by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

By reference to page 1035, report of the Postmaster-General, 1889, it will be observed that the gross postal receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, in that city were $7,617.17; the salary, clerk-hire, rent, light, and fuel, and other incidental expenses aggregated $2,479.04; the net postal receipts were $5,138.13, and that in addition to said post-office being self-sustaining, it yielded a net postal revenue of 67 per cent.

From computations made in this office, based upon the data contained in the papers above cited, it is found that a suitable site can be procured and a public building about 45 by 90 feet in dimensions, two stories high with basement, of fireproof construction, including heating apparatus, vaults, and approaches, and excluding elevator service, which is not deemed necessary, can be erected thereon for the accommodation of the post-office and land office for $100,000, or $50,000 less than the limit of cost proposed by said bill.

After duly considering the subject, I am of the opinion that such a public building will afford proper accommodations for the present and prospective needs of the Government offices to be located therein, and that said bill should become a law after being modified so as to make $100,000 instead of $150,000 the limit of cost of site and building.

Respectfully, yours,

JAS. H. WINDRIM,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. LELAND STANFORD,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1890.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference, for early report, of a communication from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, dated the 13th ultimo, requesting certain information in regard to the business of the land office at The Dalles, Oregon, with a view to the assignment of rooms for said office in the new Government building proposed to be erected at that place.

In reply, I have the honor to state that in the year 1878, there were 442 entries of public lands in that office, and in 1888, 2,246 entries. The number of entries will probably decrease in the next ten years; but other business in relation to the disposal of lands will, in all probability, require the same space and accommodations.

Four persons, officers and clerks, are regularly employed, and an addition to the clerical force will be made as soon as practicable. Office room is also required for the use of special agents, hearings, and contests.

The actual floor area needed for the proper accommodation of the land office and its records, should be equivalent to three rooms, each not less than 24 feet square. I may add that one of the rooms should be furnished with a safe or vault for the use of the receiver of public moneys.

On account of the inadequacy of the appropriation, no allowance has been made for office rent since 1882, when the sum of $180 per annum was authorized.

Very respectfully,

LEWIS A. GROFF, Commissioner.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator seems to lose sight of the fact that a land office in a Western State cuts a considerable figure in questions of this character. A great amount of business is done there and the Government can not transact its business there except by paying rent from time to time, and there will be more rent paid in the course of a few years for post-office apartments and land-office rooms than it would cost to erect a building with suitable accommodations.

I will also state that this bill passed the Senate at the last session, and I hope it will not be made an exception to the bills that did pass the Senate at the last session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. McPHERSON. In order that this matter may be decided once for all by the Senate, believing as I do this to be a reckless appropriation of the public money at a place where a public building is not really needed, at least not half as much needed as it is in many other localities, and for the reason I have already given, that appropriations can not be made from the public Treasury in many places where public buildings are needed, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question in regard to the bill. Is there any United States court held in Eastern Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; there is no United States court held in Eastern Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL. At what places in Oregon are United States courts held?

Mr. MITCHELL. At Portland. I will state, in further answer to the Senator from Missouri, that the question has been seriously discussed and is discussed now in regard to the necessity of providing either that terms of the United States courts shall be held in Eastern Oregon in order that witnesses, jurors, and litigants may not be dragged five or six hundred miles, or that a new district may be established, including within its boundaries that section of the State. There has never been an appropriation made for more than two public buildings in the whole State of Oregon, and these for buildings at Portland.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the size of The Dalles compared with other cities in Eastern Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is the largest city in Eastern Oregon, considerably larger in population, and certainly in business importance, than any other of the cities of Eastern Oregon. It is the fourth city, I think, in population and importance in the State.

Mr. COCKRELL. What are its transportation facilities?

Mr. MITCHELL. As to its transportation facilities, it is right on the Columbia River.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company's railway, which is a transcontinental road, runs through the city. It is an important place, and gradually becoming of more importance every day.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it such a place that in the event a United States court should be held in the eastern district of Oregon The Dalles would be the place selected at which it should be held? Is it centrally located with such facilities of communication and intercommunication as to make it a point that would probably be selected?

Mr. MITCHELL. The facilities for transportation and communication are good as far as that is concerned. As I have stated, it is located on the Columbia River, and a railroad running through the entire section of the State runs through the city. I wish to be entirely candid about this matter, and I am not prepared to say, and do not wish to predict, that The Dalles would be selected, provided a new judicial district was organized in Eastern Oregon. Of course that would be for Congress to determine; but the city of The Dalles is perhaps as well suited to accommodate the business, I think, quite as well, if not better, than any of the other cities in that section of the State. I am willing to say that much, and that much is true. There are, however, other cities of importance in that section of the State, such as Pendleton, La Grande, Baker City, and others, at any one of which a Federal court-house for a separate judicial district in that section might with propriety be located.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I understood him to say in answer to an inquiry I made that there was no court now held at The Dalles. I understand him now to say, however, that in anticipation that there may be a court held in that part of the district The Dalles would be the proper place for the court, but he does not say that it is the only place. There may be other cities desiring public buildings for such purposes.

There is no invidious distinction made by me as against Oregon or against the city of The Dalles. I only want to bring the matter up here and now in order to know whether it be the purpose of the Senate of the United States to contribute $100,000 of money at this time for a town so small, so minute that it has not even a place in the census report as a city of 1,000 people; and confessedly this building is to be erected for no other purpose in the world except for a post-office and a land office.

The Senator knows there are hundreds of such offices in the country, and we do not need to erect a public building costing $100,000 for a land office. Would it not be better and wiser to wait until this city grows to something like the proportions of cities that the Congress of the United States have heretofore thought proper to recognize as being sufficient to justify a public building costing $100,000. This is the idea I have in view.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is hardly fair that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] should insist, after what has been said here, that this city has, as shown, as he claims by the census report, a population of but 1,000. That perhaps is true in one census table the Senator has referred to, which is evidently a mistake, but the census reports will show when he gets down to the proper statement that the population of Dalles City is between four and five thousand.

I answered the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] in regard to the court business. I have not said that any United States court was held in Eastern Oregon. I have said just the contrary, that no term of court is now held there, but that it is the expectation of the people of the State of Oregon, and especially of the people of that section of the State, that a new district will be organized at an early day, as they think, when the matter is brought to the attention of Congress, as it will be this session by myself. I have not said that The Dalles would be selected as the place for that court, because I desire to be entirely candid about it. I have said that by reason of its transportation facilities, its location, and all that, it would, as I think, be as eligible a place for the location of the court if a new district were established there as any other of the cities which would aspire for the honor.

There is another thing, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey evidently loses sight of. He loses sight of the fact that in many of our cities of the West, while the population is not as large as that of many cities of the East, the amount of business transacted is infinitely larger in most of them—I refer to our cities in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and elsewhere on the Pacific coast—than in many cities of the East of five times the population. For instance, take the case of my own city of Portland, Oregon, where the population is only about 65,000. Last year there was a wholesale business done in that city of $131,000,000, or very much more, if I am correctly informed, than was transacted in the city of Denver, with its large population, much more, perhaps, than was transacted in many of the cities of the Senator's State, where the population probably is five or six times as large as in the city of Portland.

The Senator will be surprised, and he will be instructed as well, if he will take a little trip out to the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and take a look at them. I wish he would go down the Columbia River and go up the Columbia River, and go over our railroads, and along and through our magnificent valleys, and grand forests, and beautiful cities and towns, and take a look at the immense amount of business that is being transacted there in Portland, Astoria, The Dalles, Pendleton, and other places. I am quite sure if the Senator from New Jersey were to visit The Dalles, to see for himself the activity that prevails there, the business energy, the manufacturing industries established there, the immense amount of wool and of wheat that are coming in there every day during a great portion of the year, he would be astonished. Why, sir, we raise more wheat in one county in the State of Oregon than the Senator from New Jersey ever saw. [Laughter.]

When I traveled through the county of Umatilla fifteen years ago the only wheat grown in the whole county was a 3-acre patch. Now, they raise, well, I do not know, but perhaps 10,000,000 bushels and over in that county alone.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator please inform me whether he wants a post-office or a granary for that wheat? [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. We have the granary, and now we want the post-office. [Laughter.] My remarks were intended as an answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from New Jersey about remote States, and all that kind of thing. If the Senator would visit the State of Oregon he would not think it was such a remote State after all, and I am sure he would receive a right royal welcome if he will only come.

I have nothing more to say and ask for a vote.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. For what purpose is the building to be erected?

Mr. MITCHELL. For a post-office and other public offices.

Mr. GEORGE. What other public offices are located there?

Mr. MITCHELL. The principal land office in the State of Oregon—and we have five, I believe, in that State—is located at The Dalles. There is an immense amount of land business transacted there, as is shown by a letter on my desk from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope I shall be indulged in one remark. In a city of Mississippi containing 10,000 inhabitants and growing very rapidly, only the sum of $50,000 was allowed for a post-office building.

Mr. MITCHELL. That probably is due to the modesty of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. I congratulate the Senator from Oregon upon the growth of his State. Nobody feels happier over the result of her prosperity and her great growth than myself, but I do submit that if that Senator will take the census reports and will consult those reports and investigate the question as to all the New England States he will find cities of fifteen, thirty, forty, and even fifty thousand people, where the Government has never yet erected a public building. Go south, if you please, among the large and magnificent and growing cities there, and you will find many large cities in which the Government has erected no public building.

Take the Northern and Middle States—take Ohio. I think I heard the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] say yesterday, or I read it in the RECORD this morning, that the great State of Ohio had but six public buildings erected upon her territory. Take Pennsylvania, New York, and the Western States, Illinois, if you please, and I need not mention any more of them—take the census reports, and you will find magnificent cities, whose growth and increase in trade during the past ten years would have justified any Senator upon this floor in voting for a reasonable and moderate appropriation of money for a public building, and yet no such buildings have been erected. Take my own State, if you please. I think I have some of the figures here that I can quote for the information of the Senate.

Take Atlantic City, which has 13,000 population; Perth Amboy, 19,000; Camden, 50,000; Elizabeth, 37,000; Hoboken, 45,000. We did appropriate a hundred thousand dollars for a public building at Hoboken, with a population of 45,000 and with an increase of growth of nearly 50 per cent during the past ten years. Here is Jersey City, with a population of nearly 170,000, and the sum appropriated for the purchase of a site and erection of a public building in that city, which seems to be sufficient for the purpose, was only $80,000. Take the city of Paterson, with a population of 78,000, and it has no public building, and so on. I might go to Orange, with a population of 18,000.

Now, sir, I can not vote for an appropriation of $100,000 for a building which is confessedly nothing more than a post-office building in the city of The Dalles. I accept the Senator's statement as to the amount of the population, although it is in contradiction of the census report; but even if it has a population of 5,000, which the Senator claims for it, I can not vote for an appropriation of $100,000 to erect a post-office in the so-called city of The Dalles, Oregon, when cities in my own State of 80,000 population have never had a post-office building, and while there are many cities in the South and West and in the Middle and Eastern States with a population ten times greater that are unable to convince the committee that they too have rights which should have priority over a small town in the wilderness.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I inquire how many public buildings there are in New Jersey?

Mr. McPHERSON. I can not recall more than three at the present time; one at the capital of the State, which is a court building; another at Newark, which I think was only constructed last year, and one in Jersey City. I can recall no other public building in that State. It would seem to me that the Government ought to appropriate money for these large cities that have grown up in the great, populous parts of our country. Unless it can be shown that there is an absolute necessity for a building for court purposes or for other than post-office purposes in small towns no such appropriations should be made. In a place of 5,000 people the Government could rent a building very much cheaper and just as much to the advantage of the post-office patrons.

Mr. MITCHELL. Just another remark, Mr. President. Of the many millions of dollars that have been appropriated for public buildings in this country more than nine-tenths of the whole amount has been expended east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. GEORGE. It is always a disagreeable duty, Mr. President, to resist any appropriation that is proposed to be made which a Senator from the State wants. I do not like to disoblige any Senator in any local measure, but I feel bound to say, after what has been stated on this occasion, that the appropriation now proposed appears to me to be very largely excessive. The population of the town, as I understand, does not exceed 5,000; and it was not that much by the last census. What was it by the last census?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is not included in the list of those cities which have a population of 1,000 so far as I have been able to examine the report.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a mistake.

Mr. GEORGE. What was the population?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think about 4,400; that is in the immediate city.

Mr. GEORGE. The corporate limits?

Mr. MITCHELL. Included in the corporate limits; but of course there is a large population around in the immediate neighborhood. It is a river city, and, as I said before, a place of considerable importance in regard to the amount of business transacted there.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I want to get through. I have nearly concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. I just wanted to ask a question.

Mr. GEORGE. In a moment. I dislike very much to disoblige the Senator from Oregon, but I believe there ought to be a halt called on appropriations. The last Congress appropriated over a billion of dollars. That has caused a good deal of criticism in the country, and very just criticism. The people of the section of the country in which I reside, whatever may be the happy condition of other parts of the Union, are now suffering from the very greatest financial distress. The price of the cotton crop, which is our main dependence, is lower now than it has been for thirty or forty years. The people are burdened with debt; the farmers can not meet their obligations, and I think that this time is a very inopportune one for the purpose of expending extravagantly the public money. The people want a reduction of taxation. The burdens are heavier in that direction than they can bear, and whilst I should be willing to vote for the new and the rising and progressive and improving State of Oregon a liberal sum for a public building I can not consent to vote for this extraordinary sum, extraordinary and excessive as compared with similar appropriations made for my own State.

For the city of Meridian, one of the most progressive, enterprising, and growing cities in the South, I with difficulty got through $50,000 for the erection of a post-office there. The city of Natchez, having a population of six or eight thousand has never had a single dollar appropriated for a public building. The city of Greenville, having also a population of seven, eight, or ten thousand—I believe ten thousand—is without a single dollar in that respect. There are other towns and cities in my own State which are equally entitled to the benefits of the bounty of the Government. I feel, therefore, compelled to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Oregon that, unless this appropriation is cut in two in the middle, so as to make it something like the appropriations that have been made in similar cases in the State of Mississippi, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator another question? Has it not been his experience and has not the Senator found that where an appropriation of only $50,000 has been made for a public building after the ground for site has been purchased and the building erected you find you have one scarcely worthy of the name. Right in that connection I desire to say that property rates at a very high figure in The Dalles. You can not get a suitable site for any small amount.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not had the experience or the observation suggested by the Senator. I know that in the city of Oxford, where the Federal court is held, a post-office, a public building was erected, I believe, for the sum of $50,000. In the city of Aberdeen, where a Federal court is held, I do not think $50,000 was more than was appropriated. In only two places in the State of Mississippi have a hundred thousand dollars been expended in a public building. One was at the capital of the State, where there was a Federal court and a land office, and the other was at the city of Vicksburg, where there was a Federal court and not a land office, but I believe a custom-house. I think we had as well go a little slow in appropriations. The people are oppressed; taxes ought to be reduced, and they can not be reduced if we go on making these extravagant appropriations.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator (I do not remember to have heard whether he made answer to the question or whether the question was put to him) what the gross receipts of the office at The Dalles are?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not able to state at the moment. The amount, however, is stated in the letter of the Supervising Architect which I sent to the desk a few minutes since.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, it occurs to me to say now, in the midst of this controversy, while the Senator is looking for his papers, that in the first session of the Fiftieth Congress I proposed a measure here, the first of the kind ever presented in either branch of Congress, to provide a general law for the construction of all post-office buildings wherever post-office buildings should be built, on a plan and by a method which should be entirely impartial as to the amount of appropriations and as to the location of the offices in the several States. The proposition was to this effect——

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish this sentence—I am not going to make a speech—the proposition was to this effect substantially: That, starting on the basis where the annual aggregate gross receipts for three successive years for a town should be ascertained to be $3,000 for each year, amounting to $9,000, a post-office building should be built, the appropriation for which should not exceed this sum of three times the sum of such receipts. That proposition has been pending here in one form or another ever since. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds twice or three times, not exactly in the form in which I introduced my bill, but another bill based substantially on the same idea. I refer to the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. As I have listened to this discussion to-day I have been more impressed with the importance of some such legislation as that.

The bill as it stands now reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds limits the construction of these post-office buildings to offices of what are known as the fourth-class, and limits the maximum appropriation to $25,000. I shall propose, when that bill comes up for consideration, an amendment removing the limit entirely, so that all post-office buildings, commencing with the class I have named, may be constructed upon that basis, so as to do away with these perpetual controversies arising on these bills for special acts on account of excessive appropriations in some places and too small appropriations in others. At some time or other in the near future we must come to some such rule of legislation as this or we shall come to infinite trouble—much greater trouble than we have yet known. But until some general plan such as I have described shall be adopted by legislation I shall vote for these bills which have been reported upon favorably both by the Supervising Architect and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MITCHELL. The report of the Supervising Architect, recommending the appropriation of $100,000 for the public building at The Dalles is dated March 1, 1890. When this bill was first introduced, nearly two years ago, the Supervising Architect recommended that amount, which was $50,000 less than the limit of cost proposed by the bill; which, as originally introduced by me, was for $150,000. The Supervising Architect says:

By reference to page 1035, Report of the Postmaster-General, 1889—

He goes back to the report of the Postmaster-General of 1889, over three years ago—

It will be observed that the gross postal receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889 in that city were $7,617.17; the salary, clerk hire, rent, light, and fuel and other incidental expenses aggregated $2,479.04; the net postal receipts were $5,138.13, and that in addition to said post-office being self-sustaining, it yielded a net postal revenue of 67 per cent.

From computations made in this office, based upon the data contained in the papers above cited, it is found that a suitable site can be procured and a public building about 45 by 90 feet in dimensions, two stories high, with basement, of fireproof construction, including heating apparatus, vaults, and approaches, and excluding elevator service, which is not deemed necessary, can be erected thereon for the accommodation of a post-office and land office for $100,000, or $50,000 less than the limit of cost proposed by said bill.

After duly considering the subject, I am of the opinion that such a public building will afford proper accommodations for the present and prospective needs of the Government offices to be located therein, and that said bill should become a law after being modified so as to make $100,000 instead of $150,000 the limit of cost of site and building.

Mr. DOLPH. I only desire to say a word. I have listened to the argument of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in regard to the necessity for economy. I wish to say that this nation is wealthy enough and the Treasury is in such condition—if it is not it can be soon placed in such condition—as to enable the Government to make the necessary expenditures for every needed public work, and it is poor economy to refuse appropriations for the reasons assigned by the Senator from Mississippi or for any other reason when a great public work is demanded.

It seems to me that a statesmanlike policy would be to make the necessary appropriations for the works that are demanded, and if the condition of the Treasury will not justify the expenditure, to put the Treasury in such condition as will justify it.

In regard to post-offices, I quite agree with the Senator that if a building is required simply for a post-office there ought to be some degree of equality between the different States of the Union. Congress is here to legislate for every section, and in the distribution of the funds in the Treasury for public purposes, if the public service will permit it, I think with the Senator that there should be some equality between the States, and the question as to whether an appropriation should be for a building for a post-office alone would depend largely upon the population of the city or town in which it was to be erected; that is to say, the number of patrons of the office and the receipts of the office.

But in this case, as in many others, there is another question that comes up. A building is not required at this point alone for a post-office. It is required for a district land office and will be required for many years. There is not a Federal public building in all of Eastern Oregon, which embraces about two-thirds of the State of Oregon, or something over 60,000 square miles, and I have no doubt that the expense of procuring a suitable and proper building for a post-office, so that the public shall be decently accommodated—and certainly the General Government ought to see that that is done—and of securing proper accommodations for the local land office, is as great annually at the present time as the interest would be on the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill. While the town is growing and the State is filling up, the business of both the post-office and the local land office will increase from year to year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is recorded as voting?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I therefore withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present,

Mr. DAWES. Has the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DAWES. I am paired with him; otherwise I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. BARBOUR. I desire to know if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then I withhold my vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea." If no quorum has voted I will vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum has voted.

Mr. MANDERSON. I then withhold my vote on account of my pair.

Mr. WOLCOTT (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] on political matters. I fail to understand that this vote has any particular political significance, but I will withdraw my vote unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. CAREY. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PROVIDENCE, R. I.

The bill (S. 580) to provide a suitable site for a post-office in the city of Providence, R. I.; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see that the Senator who introduced the bill is not here. I do not know whether his colleague is familiar with the situation or not. I see there is no report with it. Was the bill passed at the last session?

Mr. DIXON. The bill was passed by the Senate at the last session, but did not pass the other House. The necessity for extended postal facilities in Providence has been very great for a long time. The post-office is at present in the Government building, which was erected more than thirty-five years ago, when the city of Providence contained a population of about 50,000. The population of the city of Providence has increased very greatly; it is 132,146, I think, by the last census.

The building, which was erected about thirty-five years ago, has been occupied by the post-office, the United States circuit and district courts, the custom-house, the internal-revenue offices, and the offices of the officers connected with the courts. The accommodations are exceedingly limited, and the public business in the post-office department can not be performed either conveniently or economically. The building stands upon a piece of land that is 60 feet by 134, including the walks at the side and around the building. The accommodations are so cramped that the business of the post-office can not be properly performed.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is for a separate building purely for the post-office?

Mr. DIXON. It is purely for the post-office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FRESNO, CAL.

The bill (S. 1206) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Fresno, in the State of California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a report in that case. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PADDOCK in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, January 12, 1892, as follows:

The committee recommend the passage of this bill without amendment. The bill passed the Senate during the last Congress. The committee append the report made then.

[Senate Report No. 1876, Fifty-first Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred Senate bill 3940 "to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Fresno, in the State of California," respectfully report in favor of the passage of the same. In support of the bill the following is submitted:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of letter of the 12th instant from your committee, requesting a report from this office upon Senate bill 3940, introduced May 26, 1890, by you, to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building for the accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in Fresno, Cal., at a cost not exceeding $75,000.

In reply I have to call attention to the report made from this office June 13, 1890, to your committee upon said bill, in compliance with request contained in letter dated May 28, 1890, from your committee. (Copy inclosed.)

In said report the statement was made that from computations made, based upon the data received, therein specifically referred to, with the amount of money which the bill proposes to fix as the limit of cost, it was found that a building two stories high, with basement, about 50 feet by 100 feet in dimensions, the first floor giving about 5,000 square feet of floor area for the post-office, or 10 per cent increase over the accommodations now provided for the post-office, the second story covering about three-fifths of the floor area of the first story, for the accommodation of the internal-revenue office and signal office, built of brick, with stone trimmings, not of fireproof construction, can be erected for about $75,000; or

That such a building, faced with stone, of fireproof construction, including heating apparatus, vaults, and approaches, can be erected for about $100,000; also,

That from a letter received through Hon. William Vandever from Mr. Thomas F. Hughes, offering to donate land as a site for the building, a corner lot of dimensions of 50 feet by 140 feet, said lot would be too small for the proposed building, and to provide the 40-foot fire limit 40 feet by 140 feet additional land would have to be acquired to afford a proper site; also,

That it is stated in the postmaster's letter, referred to in the report, that he estimates the value of land, centrally located in the business portion of the city, as being from $400 to $1,000 per front foot, having a depth of 150 feet.

Thus it will be observed that the estimated amount for the building alone is $75,000 or $100,000, contingent upon the character of the building to be erected, and to make the site offered to be donated available it would be necessary to acquire 40 feet of land additional to provide a 40-foot fire limit required by the bill, making the estimated cost of the additional land to complete the site probably amount to $16,000, or, for an entire site if purchased, $36,000, these calculations being made at the minimum rate for the land specified in the postmaster's report.

Respectfully yours,

JAS. H. WINDRIM,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. LELAND STANFORD,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay the regular order before the Senate, which is Senate bill 539.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senate is ready to vote on the bill which has been read and the report read, I am quite willing that a vote should be taken upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from California what is the population of Fresno, and also as to whether any courts are held there and whether any officers of the Government except those connected with the post-office are located there?

Mr. FELTON. There are no courts held there, I think. Fresno is the largest city within the great San Joaquin Valley. It is somewhat of a railroad center. Its inhabitants number from fourteen to fifteen thousand, and the city is situated in a densely populated part of the country. In fact, it is the center of that valley and a very growing place. The appropriation that is provided in the bill is not large, and I understand that a portion of the land for the building may be given by the city, so that the United States will not have to purchase it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868."

Mr. DOLPH. I had hoped and expected that the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] would be present and would occupy the floor this afternoon. I understand that he has returned to the city, but is not well. His colleague [Mr. TURPIE] has been endeavoring to get in communication with him, and can report whether he will be able to be present and be heard to-day.

Mr. TURPIE. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I regret I have not yet heard from my colleague, but I think I shall hear from him in a few minutes. Still, I would not like to delay the Senator from Oregon in the discussion.

Mr. DOLPH. I would much prefer to submit anything further I have to submit upon this bill after the Senator from Indiana has made his speech. It would also have been a matter of great convenience to me if the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] had been printed in the RECORD before proceeding. I expected to see it there, and therefore attended to some other matters that seemed to imperatively demand my attention while the Senator was speaking and did not listen to all he had to say, because his speech was composed to a considerable extent of quotations from testimony. I could not even while I listened follow the line of his argument. But rather than that the bill should be laid aside and its consideration postponed indefinitely I will proceed now. If the Senator from Indiana comes in I shall be quite willing to discontinue my remarks and listen to him, and conclude after he has made his speech. I have no prepared speech, and it would not discommode me at all. If he is to submit anything to the Senate that I think requires attention, I should prefer to speak after he has concluded. So, if he comes in at any time this afternoon I will give way for that purpose.

Mr. TURPIE. I am much obliged to the Senator from Oregon for the courtesy, and I will let my colleague know his wishes as soon as he enters the Chamber.

Mr. DOLPH. Now, Mr. President, reversing the order in which I proceeded to consider the bill on Monday last, I will devote my attention, first, to some of the legal propositions which have been advanced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I would esteem it a great favor if we could have such order in the Senate Chamber that what I have to submit may be heard by the reporters, and I would very much like to get the ears of Senators who are to vote upon this measure. I know it is an old matter that has been often discussed in the Senate, but new Senators have come in who have not heard the former discussions and probably are not familiar with the case. I have such entire confidence in the merits of the measure now before the Senate that I should be very glad to get the ear of every Senator.

I referred to the case of Frelinghuysen vs. Key when I had the floor before. I now refer to a later case, reported in 139 United States Reports. It is the case of Boynton vs. Blaine.

The case commences on page 306 of the volume. It was an application to the supreme court of the District Columbia for a mandamus against the Secretary of State to compel him to pay over to the petitioner as assignee of one Weil certain moneys in respect to a claim allowed under a convention between the United States and Mexico in the adjudication of claims of citizens of either country upon the government of the other.

Mr. PLATT. Was that after the rejection of the treaty?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes. It will be understood by Senators that the case of Weil and the case of the La Abra claim stand on precisely the same footing; that precisely the same charges are made in regard to the manner in which the awards were obtained before the Mixed Commission. Precisely the same legislation has been had in regard to each; precisely the same action of the State Department has been taken in regard to each, and precisely the same legislation is now proposed by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to each case. Therefore, whatever is said in the opinion in this case in regard to the Weil case is just as applicable and just as forcible when applied to the La Abra claim.

Mr. FRYE. That is, so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. DOLPH. So far as the law of the case is concerned.

Mr. DAWES. May I inquire of the Senator if the evidence is the same, applicable to both?

Mr. DOLPH. No; but the question of law. I qualified my statement. It is applicable so far as the law of the case is concerned.

Mr. DAWES. It was my fault that I did not hear. Will the Senator allow me to inquire, if it is proper before the discussion of the other case, whether there is any material difference in the weight of testimony on that point?

Mr. DOLPH. It is claimed that there is. From my examination of the testimony I do not think there is a particle of difference in regard to the facts in the two cases; that is to say, as to the weight of testimony. I think both claims were fraudulent in the inception. They were manufactured. They are supported by fraudulent and false testimony, and the Government of the United States was equally imposed upon in both.

It has been claimed by some of the opponents of the bill now under consideration by the Senate that in this case the question involved is simply a question of exaggerated damages; that there was proof to sustain to some extent a claim against Mexico, and that in this respect this case differs from the case of Weil, which was for the loss of mules and cotton, I believe, and in which the testimony shows that the claimant never had a mule or a bale of cotton. In this case the La Abra Company had a mine in Mexico; but that does not alter the case. That does not make a case against the Government of Mexico. It is necessary to show that the parties were deprived of their mines and of their property by Mexico before they can get even a foundation for a claim against that country.

I presume that some Senators were amused who followed the drift of the argument of the Senator from Missouri yesterday when he was talking about Exall, who was the archconspirator and false swearer upon whose testimony this award was obtained before the Mexican Commission. He argued that Exall had conspired with Granger to secure this mine and to misrepresent the character and value of the mine to the officers of the company in New York that he might make something out of it. And that after his return to New York he had been in correspondence with Granger, who was in charge of the mine, with this view. I should have thought it would have occurred to the Senator that that proposition was not very consistent with the idea that the company had been driven from its mine and deprived of the possession of it long before that time.

But I propose now to proceed to see what there is in this case; and as I have not very fully stated the history of the case, I will ask to have read the history of it summarized by the Supreme Court reporter in the case just cited from the answer of the Secretary of State detailing the history of the case. Such a statement certainly ought to be a satisfactory history of the case. In the application for the award the proceedings before the Mixed Commission were set up. Quotations were made from the treaty to show that the award between the two countries, Mexico and the United States, was to be final and conclusive; the fact was stated that the money had been paid, and that it was under the control of the Secretary of State, and it was alleged to be his duty to pay it over to Weil and his associates, and upon these allegations an application was made for a mandamus.

The petitioner prayed for process that a peremptory writ of mandamus be granted upon hearing. The mandamus was denied and the case was appealed from the supreme court of the District to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision of that court, without a dissent, was rendered by Chief Justice Fuller. I ask Senators to give attention to the statement of the Secretary of State in the answer to the petition, giving the history of this case; and I ask the Chief Clerk to read, commencing at the bottom of the page, with the words "A rule to show cause," and reading until he comes to the opinion of the court.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to say, before the Chief Clerk proceeds to read, that I concur with the Senator from Oregon in the view that that is the clearest and best statement that I have ever yet seen as to all the historical parts of this transaction. Of course it does not deal with the question of fraud on the part of these claimants—the testimony——

Mr. DOLPH. It deals only with the questions of law involved.

Mr. MORGAN. But it disposes of every question of law that has been raised in argument in this case now or heretofore—every one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read as indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A rule to show cause having been entered, the Secretary of State answered, stating, among other things, the amount that would be paid to relator "if the President of the United States, in whose control is the said undistributed balance, should determine that it is not inconsistent with the public interests to pay the same, or so much thereof as would be ratably payable, to the said Boynton," but saying, "that the President of the United States has forbidden the payment of any part of the said net balance on the ground hereinafter stated, and that for that reason no scheme of distribution of the said net balance has been made." The answer then alleged that the money paid by Mexico became, upon receipt, the money of the United States, and not in any way subject to the demand or control of the original claimants, who were not recognized by the said Commission, the only parties to which, and who appeared before the Commission, being the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Mexico, each represented by one person, in virtue of Article II of the treaty.

It was further stated that the allegation of the petition that the United States was under some obligation "to make distribution and payment pro rata to the claimants in whose favor awards had been made" was not founded on any provision of the said treaty. And further, that the United States was "invested with the entire control of said claims to enable it to discharge any international duty that may attach thereto or to any part thereof, and that if the President of the United States has probable cause to think that good faith toward the Republic of Mexico and a proper regard for the honor of the United States require that any part of the money so paid by the Republic of Mexico should be withheld from distribution, this respondent is advised that it is the duty of the President to withhold payment of the same until a proper investigation can be had; and this respondent, answering, saith, that so it is that grave charges and representations impeaching the integrity of the evidence on which the award in the case of said Weil was made have been brought to the notice of the Government of the United States in a way to command its earnest attention, and that it is the desire of the President to have the said charges and representations investigated so soon as the Congress shall have provided the means for doing so."

The answer also averred that a bill had been reported to the Senate on June 20, 1888, "to provide for the desired investigation by investing the supreme court of the District of Columbia with jurisdiction over the subject;" that "while the said charges and representations are pending the President of the United States hath concluded that payment of the money now demanded by the relator should be withheld;" and that the course thus taken by the President was in harmony with section 5 of the act of June 18, 1878.

The inference set up in the petition as deducible from the rejection by the Senate of the convention of July 13, 1882, was denied, and the contrary inference suggested, in view of the bill reported in the Senate, that "the refusal of the Senate to ratify the said convention was the result of a desire that the proposed investigation into the said charges and representations should be made by a tribunal deriving jurisdiction over the subject from a law of the United States."

It was then averred that the money awarded was not held by respondent impressed with a trust for the parties claiming to be entitled to the same, but as the agent of the President, whose control over it was complete, and who could at any time withdraw it from the control of the respondent; that to hold him accountable as a trustee might be to subject him to personal liability for the money; and that it would cause an embarrassing conflict to adjudge him responsible to private parties for a fund which it might be the duty of the United States to return to the Republic of Mexico, as decided in the case of Frelinghuysen vs. Key, referred to by relator. The answer finally alleged that the petition related to a matter "which falls exclusively within the powers and competency of the President of the United States, and this respondent as subordinate to him and subject to his direction and control, and which doth in nowise fall within the jurisdiction and competency of the judicial department of the Government of the United States; and that it would involve an interference of the said judicial department with a matter which is exclusively committed by the Constitution to its coördinate, the executive department, for this honorable court to take cognizance of the matter of the relator's petition."

The cause having been heard, the mandamus was refused and the petition dismissed, whereupon a writ of error was allowed to this court.

The following may be taken as a sufficiently comprehensive statement of the matters upon which the judgment proceeded.

The time for decision fixed by the convention of July 4, 1868, was from time to time extended, finally until November 20, 1876, and payment of the first installment to the Government in favor of whose citizens the greater amount might have been awarded, was provided to be made on or before January 31, 1877. (19 Stat., 642.)

On the 19th of January, 1877, Mr. Secretary Fish invited the attention of Congress to the necessity of making provision for carrying the awards into effect, and pointed out that "an appropriation by Congress will be necessary for the payment of the amount of the awards against the United States, which sum, by the terms of the treaty, is to be deducted from the awards against Mexico and from the amount to be paid by Mexico. Provision should also be made for the distribution among the several parties entitled to the money as it may be received, and also for the reimbursement to the United States of the amount paid by the United States toward the joint expenses of the Commission, and which, by the terms of the treaty, is to be deducted from the awards."

A bill to carry out the Secretary's recommendation passed the House during the Forty-fourth Congress, and was favorably reported in the Senate, but was recommitted to enable the committee to consider the complaints made by the Mexican Government as to the manner in which the awards in favor of La Abra Company and Weil were procured. The Mexican Government had, in the mean time, notified the Secretary of State that evidence, not within its knowledge or control before the awards were rendered, had been discovered, which, it was claimed, would establish the fact that the awards in the cases of La Abra Company and Benjamin Weil were procured by fraudulent imposition upon the Commission and upon the Government of the United States on the part of the claimants.

The finality of the awards as between the two governments was not denied by Mexico, and the Mexican minister announced the intention of the Government to comply with the treaty by paying the installments as they became due. At the next session a bill passed both Houses entitled, "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868," which was approved June 18, 1878. (20 Stat., 144.) Sections 1 and 5 of this act are as follows:

"That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to receive any and all moneys which may be paid by the Mexican Republic under and in pursuance of the conventions between the United States and the Mexican Republic for the adjustment of claims, concluded July 4, 1868, and April 29, 1876; and whenever, and as often as, any installments shall have been paid by the Mexican Republic on account of said awards, to distribute the moneys so received in ratable proportions among the corporations, companies, or private individuals respectively in whose favor awards have been made by said commissioners, or by the umpires, or to their legal representatives or assigns, except as in this act otherwise limited or provided, according to the proportion which their respective awards shall bear to the whole amount of such moneys then held by him, and to pay the same, without other charge or deduction than is hereinafter provided, to the parties respectively entitled thereto. And in making such distribution and payment, due regard shall be had to the value at the time of such distribution of the respective currencies in which the said awards are made payable, and the proportionate amount of any award of which by its terms the United States is entitled to retain a part shall be deducted from the payment to be made on such award, and shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the unappropriated money in the Treasury.

"SEC. 5. And whereas the Government of Mexico has called the attention of the Government of the United States to the claims hereinafter named with a view to a rehearing, therefore be it enacted, that the President of the United [States] be and he is hereby requested to investigate any charges of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the cases hereinafter named, and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law or considerations of justice and equity, require that the awards in the cases of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, or either of them, should be opened and the cases retried, it shall be lawful for him to withhold payment of said awards, or either of them, until such case or cases shall be retired and decided in such manner as the governments of the United States and Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct. And in case of such retrial and decision, any moneys paid or to be paid by the Republic of Mexico in respect of said awards respectively, shall be held to abide the event, and shall be disposed of accordingly; and the said present awards shall be set aside, modified, or affirmed as may be determined on such retrial: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as an expression of any opinion of Congress in respect to the character of said claims, or either of them."

Under the provision of the fifth section, President Hayes caused the charges of fraud preferred by the Mexican Government to be investigated, and Mr. Evarts, then Secretary of State, made a careful examination of the newly discovered evidence presented by Mexico, and submitted his conclusions to the President in August, 1879, which were in substance: That neither the principles of public law nor considerations of justice and equity required or permitted as between the United States and Mexico that the awards should be opened and the cases retried before a new international tribunal, or under any new convention or negotiation respecting the same; that, however, the matters called to the attention of the Government on the part of Mexico brought into grave doubt the substantial integrity of the claim of Benjamin Weil and the sincerity of the evidence as to the measure of damages insisted upon and accorded in the case of La Abra Silver Mining Company; that the honor of the United States required that these two cases should be further investigated by the United States to ascertain whether this Government had been made the means of enforcing against a friendly power claims of our citizens based upon or exaggerated by fraud; that if further investigation should remove the doubts, the honor of the United States would have been completely maintained, but if, on the other hand, the claimants should fail in removing these doubts, or they should be replaced by certain condemnation, the honor of the United States would be vindicated by such measures as might then be dictated; and that, as the executive had not the means of instituting and pursuing methods of investigation which could coerce the production of evidence or compel the examination of parties and witnesses, and the authority for such an investigation must proceed from Congress, the proofs and conclusions the President might come to thereon, if adverse to the immediate payment on these awards of the installments received from Mexico, "should be laid before Congress for the exercise of their plenary authority in the matter."

These views were adopted by President Hayes, and on the 15th of April, 1880, were communicated to Congress with another report of Mr. Secretary Evarts, under date of April 13, 1880, recapitulating his report of the preceding August, and concluding: "Unless Congress should now make this disposition of the matter, and furnish thereby definite instructions to the Department to reserve further payment upon these awards till the conclusion of such investigation, and to make such further order with the same thereafter as Congress might direct, it would appear to be the duty of the Executive to accept these awards as no longer open to reconsideration, and to proceed in the payment of the same pro rata with all other awards under the convention." On April 27 1880, a bill was introduced in the Senate directing the Court of Claims to investigate the claims in question, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported adversely, and in effect that the proper remedy was in a new convention, in which provision should be made for doing justice to all claimants. On a bill of like character the House Committee on Foreign Affairs made a favorable report.

In August, 1880, Mr. Secretary Evarts, having been notified through the Mexican legation of the intention of the Mexican Government to commence suits to impeach and set aside the two awards, objected to such proceeding as in contradiction of the whole purpose of the convention, as well as of explicit provisions thereof; and accordingly no further steps were taken in that direction.

No definite instructions were given by Congress in respect to the matter during that session, but after its close payments were made upon these awards by the direction of the President, the same as on the others. Another installment was paid by the Mexican Government and distributed to these claimants, with the rest, during President Garfield's Administration. In this way five installments were distributed. After President Arthur came into office he examined the cases further, and "believing that said award was obtained by fraud and perjury," negotiated a treaty with Mexico providing for a rehearing. On January 31, 1882, the sixth installment was paid by Mexico to Mr. Frelinghuysen, then Secretary of State, but a distribution of this installment to these claimants was withheld by order of the President.

The cases of Frelinghuysen v. Key and La Abra Silver Mining Company v. Frelinghuysen (110 U. S., 63), were decided by this court January 7, 1884. President Arthur negotiated the convention with Mexico for a rehearing of the cases by a joint commission, July 13, 1882, and sent it to the Senate for its consideration. This convention was rejected by the Senate, April 21, 1886. On May 11, 1886, President Cleveland transmitted to Congress a report of the then Secretary of State, dated May 6, in respect to the claim in question. Mr. Bayard in his communication gave a résumé of the various proceedings touching the claims, and suggested that the President "notify Congress of the conditions of the law and facts." He said: "It is within the province of the legislative branch of this Government now to review the history of the proceedings—legislative, executive, and judicial—connected with the two claims;" and, referring to the act of June 18, 1878, thus concluded:

"This last-mentioned act of Congress contained the further provision—stated not additionally, but in the alternative to those above recited—'or until Congress shall otherwise direct.' To relieve the action of our government from any ambiguity of legislative expression, or the Executive from any uncertainty as to his line of duty in relation to the awards in favor of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, under the treaty with Mexico promulgated February, 1869, I suggest that the attention of Congress should be earnestly invoked to the consideration of the present status of these claims referred to, and the duty of the Executive under an existing treaty, to which the force and effect of paramount law is given by the Constitution, in the event of the adjournment of the two Houses without further action in reference thereto."

March 5, 1888, President Cleveland in a special message transmitted a recommendation from the Secretary of State that "Congress take action to provide expressly for the reference of the claims in question to the Court of Claims or such other court as may be deemed proper, in order that a competent investigation of the charges of fraud may be made." The Secretary's communication referred to Frelinghuysen v. Key, and inclosed a letter from the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, dated March 5, 1887, containing a resolution embodying the views of a majority of that committee, and requesting the President to withhold further payments on the awards in question until the allegations of fraud "shall have been duly investigated by the courts of the United States, under the direction of the President, or under the further direction of Congress," and letters from members of the House of Representatives upon the same subject, dated March 5 and 7, 1887.

The Secretary stated that it was thought that a proper judicial investigation of the claims in question might be secured under the twelfth section of the act approved March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," and that the Department had sought the consent of the claimants in the Weil and La Abra cases to an investigation and decision of the allegations of fraud in relation thereto, by the Court of Claims, which was declined. The President's message closed with these words: "If for any reason this proceeding be considered inadvisable, I respectfully ask that some final and definite action be taken directing the executive department of the Government what course to pursue in the premises. In view of the long delay that has already occurred in these cases, it would seem but just to all parties concerned that the Congress should speedily signify its final judgment upon the awards referred to, and make the direction contemplated by the act of 1878, in default of which the money now on hand applicable to such awards remains undistributed."

New bills were introduced providing for a judicial investigation of the charges of fraud in connection with these claims, and on June 20, 1888, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations made a report recommending the passage of a bill for that purpose, in the Weil case. An inquiry was subsequently ordered by the Senate with reference to the La Abra claim, which commenced September 24, 1888, and extended to February 27, 1889, and was reported upon March 1, 1889. The petition in this case was filed November 23, 1889.

Mr. DOLPH. I will now refer to the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Fuller. It has already been stated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that this decision covers every point which has been raised and discussed by the Senator from Missouri. I think so myself. After laying down some elementary propositions of law in regard to when a mandamus will be allowed and when it will not, the learned Chief Justice proceeded to state what I shall read.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator give the volume and page?

Mr. DOLPH. I am reading from 139 United States Reports, page 319. The court say:

In view of these settled principles was the relator entitled to the writ?

Upon establishing at the seat of Government an Executive Department to be known as the State Department, with a Secretary of State as its head, Congress provided:

"The Secretary of State shall perform such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President relative to correspondences, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to the Department, and he shall conduct the business of the Department in such manner as the President shall direct." (R. S., §§ 199, 202; 1 Stat., pp. 28, 68.)

It is contended, however, that, in this instance, the final custody of the money was vested by the act of June 18, 1878, solely in the Secretary of State, and that it was thereby made his duty to distribute and pay the awards to the claimants independently of the direction or control of the President. But the act thus referred to as the basis of this application, when considered throughout as it must be, not only does not undertake to impose the payment of these awards as an independent duty upon the Secretary, but specifically subjects such payment to the control of the President. The Secretary of State was, indeed, authorized and required by the first section to receive from Mexico the whole money awarded, and to distribute the same from time to time as the installments came in, among those in whose favor awards had been made, or to their legal representatives or assigns, but this was accompanied by the restriction, explicitly expressed, out of abundant caution, "except as in this act otherwise limited or provided."

And by section five, the payment and distribution were limited, so far as the cases of Weil and La Abra Company were concerned, by the request to the President to investigate any charges of fraud as to those claims, and the provision that if he should be of the opinion "that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity," required that the awards, thus specifically named, or either of them, should be reopened, and the cases retried, it should be lawful for him "to withhold payment of said awards, or either of them, until such case or cases shall be retried and decided in such manner as the Governments of the United States and Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct."

Payment of the Weil award had been withheld by the President, after an investigation, but the case had not been retried and decided in a manner agreed upon by the United States and Mexico, nor had Congress otherwise directed. How then could Weil or his assignee, the relator, insist upon payment under the first section of the act in disregard of the limitation imposed by the fifth? On what principle could it be held that the duty was imposed upon the Secretary to pay an award by an act expressly providing that payment should not be made in a specified contingency, which had occurred? What power had he to do the thing demanded in virtue of legislation which forbade it to be done?

The political trust with which every government is charged, as respects its own citizens, was not the ground of relator's contention, but he relied on the act of 1878 as giving him the right to enforce the alleged obligation by judicial proceedings, and it was essential to the maintenance of his position that the record should bring him within its terms.

The principal propositions urged by counsel are, "that the award made against Mexico in favor of Benjamin Weil remains a final and conclusive adjudication in favor of a citizen of the United States against a foreign government."

And that I understand to be substantially the claim made—that "the United States have not now and never have had any property, right, or interest in the original claim or the award, or in the money paid in by Mexico to meet and satisfy it;" that "the money so paid is, by the terms of a statute, in the official custody of the Secretary of State; the President of the United States has now no lawful control over it, and never had any lawful control over it, excepting for a temporary purpose during the pendency of a new treaty in the Senate; that control ended when the Senate rejected the new treaty."

These propositions have already been substantially disposed of by the decision of this court in Frelinghuysen vs. Key (110 U. S., 63), from the principles announced in which we have no disposition to recede.

There the Supreme Court, in its decision through Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, emphatically say that they do not recede from the propositions laid down in the case of Frelinghuysen vs. Key, and that that decision disposed of all these contentions.

It was there ruled, Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion, that there was no doubt as to the conclusiveness of the awards under the convention of July 4, 1868, but that the language of the treaty was to be construed as used in a compact between two nations for the adjustment of the claims of the citizens of either against the other; that citizens of the United States having claims against Mexico were not parties to the convention; that while the claims of individual citizens were to be considered by the Commission in determining amounts, the whole purpose of the convention was to ascertain how much was due from one Government to the other on account of the demands of their respective citizens; that, as between the United States and Mexico, the awards were final and conclusive until set aside by agreement between the two governments or otherwise; that the right of the United States to treat with Mexico for a retrial was unquestionable; that each Government, when it entered into the compact under which the awards were made, relied on the honor and good faith of the other for protection, as far as possible, against frauds and impositions by the individual claimants; "and that where a fraudulent claim or false testimony was presented by a citizen for reference to the Commission, this was an imposition on his own government, and it would be not only its right but its duty to repudiate the act, if it afterward discovered that it had in this way been made an instrument of wrong towards a friendly power."

There is another most emphatic statement contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Frelinghuysen vs. Key, reiterated and reaffirmed in this case of Boynton vs. Blaine, which I will repeat:

And that where a fraudulent claim or false testimony was presented by a citizen for reference to the Commission, this was an imposition on his own government, and it would be not only its right but its duty to repudiate the act, if it afterward discovered that it had in this way been made an instrument of wrong towards a friendly power. And the Chief Justice said: "International arbitration must always proceed on the highest principles of national honor and integrity. Claims presented and evidence submitted to such a tribunal must necessarily bear the impress of the entire good faith of the government from which they come, and it is not to be presumed that any government will for a moment allow itself knowingly to be made the instrument of wrong in any such proceeding.

"No technical rules of pleading as applied in municipal courts ought ever to be allowed to stand in the way of the national power to do what is right under all the circumstances. Every citizen who asks the intervention of his own government against another for the redress of his personal grievances must necessarily subject himself and his claim to these requirements of international comity." And considering the act of June 18, 1878, in its operation upon the question of further negotiations, it was remarked that no disposition was manifested "on the part of Congress to encroach on the power of the President and Senate to conclude another treaty with Mexico in respect to any or even all the claims allowed by the Commission, if in their opinion the honor of the United States should demand it. At most it only provides for receiving and distributing the sums paid without a protest or reservation, such as, in the opinion of the President, is entitled to further consideration. It does not undertake to set any new limits on the powers of the Executive." As to the fifth section of that act, it was observed "From the beginning to the end it is, in form even, only a request from Congress to the Executive. This is far from making the President for the time being a quasi-judicial tribunal to hear Mexico and the implicated claimants and determine once for all, as between them, whether the charges which Mexico makes have been judicially established."

And it was added—

And to this I call the especial attention of Senators who have any doubt upon the power of Congress in this matter—

And it was added that, "as between the United States and the claimants, the honesty of the claims is always open to inquiry for the purposes of fair dealing with the government against which, through the United States, a claim has been made."

The new convention was then pending in the Senate, and it was clear that the discretion of the executive department of the Government to withhold all further payments to the relators until the diplomatic negotiations between the two Governments on the subject were finally concluded could not be controlled by the judiciary.

This is conceded by the relator, and such a concession is inconsistent with the contention that the award was a final and conclusive adjudication in Weil's favor, as an individual, against Mexico. As between nations the proprietary right in respect to those things belonging to private individuals or bodies corporate within a nation's territorial limits is absolute, and the rights of Weil can not be regarded as distinct from those of his Government. The Government assumed the responsibility of presenting his claim, and made it its own in seeking redress in respect to it. Under this convention it was the balance that was to be paid, after deducting from what was found in favor of one government that which was found in favor of the other. So that the moneys paid in liquidation of that balance belonged to the United States.

Not to Weil or to the La Abra Company, or, to put it in different language, the money which is now in control of the Secretary of State, which has not been distributed to these claimants, belongs to the United States and not to the La Abra Company or its assigns. So Mr. Chief Justice Fuller says:

So that the moneys paid in liquidation of that balance belonged to the United States, to be increased by appropriation to the extent of the amounts allowed Mexico, and the aggregate to be distributed to the claimants as might be provided.

In United States ex rel. Angarica vs. Bayard, 127 U. S. 251, 259, where a sum of money had been received by the Secretary of State as part of an award made by the Spanish-American Claims Commission, which sum of money had been eventually paid to the petitioner, but had in the mean time been invested and earned interest, it was held that the Secretary was not liable to pay such interest to the petitioner, because the sum in question was withheld by the United States and the petitioner's claim based on the withholding was a claim against the United States, and the case fell within the settled principle that interest is not allowed on claims against the United States—

In accordance with that decision whatever claim the La Abra Company and its assigns may have to this money is a claim against the United States, and it is the right of the United States to ascertain whether it was legally and equitably entitled to it before paying it over, and if in equity and good conscience it belongs to the Mexican Government to return it—and the case fell within the settled principle that interest is not allowed on claims against the United States unless the Government has stipulated to pay i erest or it is given by express statutory provision. There, under the agreement for arbitration, as here, under the convention, the claim was laid before the arbitrators and umpire "on the part of the Government of the United States," and was presented with the testimony in its favor "only through the Government of the United States" and "by the Government of the United States." So the two advocates were spoken of as "representing, respectively, the two governments," and it was stated that "the two governments will accept the awards." "Thus by the plain terms of the agreement," remarked Mr. Justice Blatchford, delivering the opinion of the court, "the amount of the award in the case of Angarica was to be paid by the Spanish Government to the Government of the United States. It was paid by the Spanish Government to the Secretary of State of the United States, representing the Government of the United States.

"If there was any unlawful withholding from the petitioner of the $41,129.74, the money was withheld by the Government of the United States, acting through the Secretary of State, and any claim of the petitioner based upon an unlawful withholding was a claim against the Government of the United States."

Congress in furnishing the auxiliary legislation needed to carry the results of the convention under consideration into effect, requested the President to so far investigate certain charges of fraud as to determine whether a retrial ought to be had. This inquiry might have resulted in reopening the awards as between the two nations, or in such reëxamination in a domestic forum as would demonstrate whether the honor of the United States required a different disposition of the particular amounts in question.

Now, I wish to read that again, and I will ask the attention of Senators to it as covering this entire case, and by a decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the land removing any difficulty in the way of the course that is proposed to be pursued by the Committee on Foreign Relations in this matter. The Chief Justice says:

This inquiry might have resulted in reopening the awards as between the two nations.

That is to say, by a new convention which was negotiated but rejected by the Senate, because a portion of the Senate believed with Secretary Evarts that this matter ought to be investigated by the United States alone without Mexico as a party, and that the United States should determine for itself what in good conscience it ought to do in the matter.

Or—

or in such reëxamination in a domestic forum—

Precisely what we are proposing to do—

as would demonstrate whether the honor of the United States required a different disposition of the particular amounts in question.

I say here is the authority of the highest judicial tribunal of the land for the very proceeding we are proposing, an investigation not in which Mexico is a party, not in which Mexico is consulted, not for the purpose of retrying the matter between Mexico and the United States, but to inform the executive department of the Government by a judicial finding what the facts are in this case that the executive department may know what the honor of the United States requires to be done with this fund, which is the money of the United States until it is distributed.

The validity and conclusiveness of the awards remained unimpugned so long as they were permitted to stand, and the principle of res adjudicata could not be invoked against the United States by individual claimants while the controversy raised as to them remained in fieri.

In Frelinghuysen v. Key, while conceding the essential value of international arbitration to be dependent upon the certainty and finality of the decision—the court adjudged that this Government need not, therefore, close its doors against an investigation into the question whether its influence had been lent in favor of a fraudulent claim. It was held that no applicable rule was so rigid as not to be sufficiently flexible to do justice, and that the extent and character of any obligation to individuals, growing out of a treaty, an award and the receipt of money thereon, were necessarily subject to such modification as circumstances might require.

So long as the political branch of the Government had not lost its control over the subject-matter by final action, the claimant was not in a position, as between himself and his Government, to insist on the conclusiveness of the award as to him. And while it is true that for the disposition of the case of Frelinghuysen v. Key it was sufficient that it appeared that diplomatic negotiations were pending which, as the court demonstrated, the act of 1878 in no manner circumscribed, it does not follow that the political department of the Government lost its control because those negotiations failed.

Now I ask the especial attention of Senators to the concluding portion of this decision:

On the contrary, that control was expressly reserved, for it was made the duty of the President, if of opinion that the cases named should be retried, to withhold payment until such retrial could be had in an international tribunal, if the two Governments so agreed, or in a domestic tribunal if Congress so directed, and, at all events, until Congress should otherwise direct. The fact that a difference of view as to whether the retrial should be international or domestic may have arisen and led to delay—or that such difference may have existed on the merits, does not affect the conclusion. The inaction of Congress is not equivalent to a direction by Congress. The political department has not parted with its power over the matter, and the intervention of the judicial department can not now be invoked.

That is the exact case that has occurred; that has been the occasion of the delay—

That is the condition of this claim to-day. President Arthur determined that under section 5 of the act of 1868 the President was authorized to withhold the payment and distribution of this award, and that it was his duty to do so, having ascertained to his satisfaction that the awards had been procured by fraud. President Cleveland followed in the footsteps of President Arthur. Mr. Secretary Bayard was a strong advocate of Congressional action by which this matter could be investigated and justice done to Mexico; and the present Administration is simply following in the steps of the two preceding Presidents and Secretaries of State.

Mr. President, we have that decision before us, bringing this case down almost to date, in which it is plainly shown that this money can not be distributed under existing legislation until Congress shall authorize it. It appears that every administration since this matter was first brought to the attention of the administration has asked Congress to take action. And in view of the reports of committees which I cited in the Senate when I opened this debate, in view of the several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the supreme court of the District in this matter, in view of the opinions of the several Secretaries of State which have been transmitted to Congress, it does not seem to me that I need to talk longer about the law of this case.

There is no dispute among those speaking officially or judicially as to the power of Congress in this matter. The only question has been whether the United States would proceed by a new convention with Mexico to inquire into the facts with regard to this claim, to ascertain whether the award was obtained by a fraudulent imposition upon our Government that justice might be done to Mexico, or whether we should proceed, as advocated by Mr. Evarts when Secretary of State under President Hayes, to have the question examined and determined by the domestic tribunals for the information of the State Department.

The Senate once on an adverse report from a committee rejected the proposition to proceed in the domestic tribunals. Afterwards a treaty was negotiated with Mexico for the reëxamination of this claim, and that was rejected presumably partly upon the ground that the proper course was supposed to be that advised by Mr. Secretary Evarts. Now, the Committee on Foreign Relations has in three different Congresses brought this matter to the attention of the Senate and reported a bill to have these claims examined in a domestic tribunal.

A matter has been called to my attention by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and as I propose to refer to it, and he, I believe, is ready to submit his remarks, I will give way for that purpose. It is a question of law relating to one of the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon yields to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. What I have to say can hardly be dignified by the phrase "submitting some remarks." I merely wish to make a motion to amend the bill, and to simply state the proposition on which the motion depends. I move to strike out the third section of the bill.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I entirely agree with the Committee on Foreign Relations as to the scheme or method they have adopted for disposing of this somewhat difficult and very long-considered question. I think, as they seem to think, that it is a question with which the Government of Mexico as such has no relation as a party. Between the United States and Mexico the final award of the tribunal established by the treaty determined all questions of lawful or international right, as I understand it.

I understand, in the next place, that it is settled by the two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the United States Government holds this fund without any legal or equitable relation to either of these claimants, using the word "equity" in the sense of a branch of the law which defines and establishes rights capable of being enforced by judicial tribunals. The United States as a nation presented a claim against another nation, which claim was measured by obligations of that other nation, legal or equitable, to our own citizens, as we held and as we argued at great length in the case of the Geneva award.

So the question for the Secretary of State, or rather for the President of the United States, under whose direction the Secretary of State is bound always to act in the discharge of duties which are not expressly defined by statute, and under whose direction the Secretary of State is expressly commanded to act by statute, by the act creating the office—the question for the President of the United States is a question of public or political discretion as to what he shall direct to be done with this sum of money which has been received from Mexico in discharge of an international obligation on her part.

I quite agree with the committee in the next step, which is that if the United States Government has been made unconsciously the instrument of wrong or fraud upon a friendly nation, or upon any nation, friendly or unfriendly, for that matter, the Government of the United States, on ascertaining it, is bound to return any sum of money which has been so received by it to the Government which has paid it over under those circumstances.

I understand that the purpose of the bill is to enable the President of the United States to instruct himself on that question by such investigation, pursued under the forms of law, as the framers of this proposed act deem necessary, through the instrumentality of a tribunal authorized to send for persons and papers, and to hear parties who may conceive themselves to be affected, favorably or injuriously, by the decision to which that tribunal shall arrive, and to report to the President of the United States.

I agree with the committee in thinking that the Court of Claims is on the whole a reasonably proper and suitable tribunal for that purpose. Considering that one thing to be desired in this matter is the satisfaction of Mexico, and that the question was an original question between our Government and that of Mexico, I should have much preferred, if the committee had thought best, that the President should have been authorized to constitute a tribunal, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate or otherwise, which should contain one or more foreign jurists of distinction, in whom the whole civilized world would have confidence and whose concurrence in any decision which this tribunal had reached would undoubtedly have been eminently satisfactory to Mexico as it would have been to us. But the committee having preferred the Court of Claims, I do not think that is a very important consideration.

However, my difficulty with the bill is in the section which provides for an appeal from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States. As I understand it, the Supreme Court of the United States is only authorized to sit for the decision of cases in law or equity or admiralty arising under the laws and treaties of the United States or under the Constitution thereof, such as are defined in the jurisdictional clause; and it is well settled that the decision of a case within the constitutional sense is the final determination of some question of legal right, using the word "legal" as including equitable in the technical sense arising between the parties described; and we can not impose upon that tribunal the duty of instructing the conscience or the understanding of any political department of the Government, whether legislative or judicial.

Now, we have gone so far as to hold that where there is a claim against the Government of the United States having a foundation in contract or in tort or in some other legal relation which if it existed between two private parties would constitute a cause of action which might be enforced by the court, the United States, although it can not be sued without its own consent, may impose upon a tribunal the duty and clothe it with the power of determining such a question between the United States and a citizen of the United States or of any foreign Government, and may impose upon the Supreme Court of the United States the appellate jurisdiction of revising such questions. But the only ground on which that proceeds is that the obligation of the United States, legal or equitable, in that case, under contract or tort or otherwise, is a legal one; that all that is wanting is a tribunal clothed with proper jurisdiction to enforce it; and that when that is created it becomes a case at law or in equity arising between the United States and a citizen thereof.

But here the whole of this report, the whole argument of my honorable friend from Oregon, the whole argument, if I understand it, of my honorable friend from Alabama (though I did not hear the whole of it), goes on the ground that there is no claim, legal or equitable, in the technical sense which I have described on the part of anybody to this fund; that its disposition is a political question to be determined according to the instructed discretion of a political department of the Government.

If that be true, we have no constitutional right to impose upon the Supreme Court of the United States the duty of dealing with it. It is the same question, in substance, which came up in regard to the pension laws very early in the history of the Government. We undertook to impose upon the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States the duty of finding the facts in regard to the claims of Revolutionary pensioners in the first few years after the Government was formed. The finding of the court was under the act of Congress to be reported to Congress, and Congress was then expected to act in accordance with the findings of the justices of the court, but still reserving its discretion as to the legislation which should take place after those facts were found. While all the judges of the Supreme Court denied the authority of Congress, if I recollect the decision aright, to impose upon them that duty, in one or two of the circuits the judges said they would act as commissioners, but that it was imposing upon them a separate duty and authority in addition to their judicial duties under the Constitution and laws.

Mr. GEORGE. In one circuit only was that done.

Mr. HOAR. They consented to act, just as the justices of the Supreme Court who were named in the act creating the Electoral Commission consented to act, and just as the courts have acted, I think, in one or two other cases which might be referred to. But the other judges not only agreed with their brother in that one circuit in denying the authority of Congress to impose those duties upon them without their consent, but also refused to exercise the jurisdiction which was imposed.

Mr. GEORGE. And that judge afterward resigned.

Mr. HOAR. So, Mr. President, if we desire to have this matter finally disposed of and get rid of it in accordance with the general theory which has been agreed upon, I believe unanimously, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, it seems to me we should strike out the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. While, if the committee should recommend the substituting of some additional and revising power for that, which we might create, I should not withhold my vote from it, I, myself, for one, should be entirely content to leave the whole matter to the Court of Claims; and I think the constitution of that court is such that all parties in interest, whether Mexico or these claimants under the awards, will acquiesce in the judgment of that court as an impartial, learned, and industrious tribunal.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I desire also to yield at this time for some remarks that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] desires to make. I understand that he expects to be absent from the Senate to-morrow, and if he has not an opportunity to submit his remarks this afternoon he will not have an opportunity to submit them at all on the bill. As I have already given way to the Senator from Massachusetts to submit his amendment, which can be moved now and go over for action at least until after I have concluded my remarks, I will give way to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to allow me to add to what I said the citation where the history of the matter to which I referred will be found. I desire to refer to Miller on the Constitution of the United States, page 351, and the succeeding pages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator from Connecticut goes on I wish to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HAWLEY. I submit it to the Senator from Oregon. I am speaking in his time.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire only a moment to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I think we should be prepared on authority to show him that the appeal to the Supreme Court is within the jurisdiction of that court as it is now provided by law. At the same time I concur with the Senator that the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is of no practical value to any person. It was put in the bill out of abundant caution, lest some one might complain that we had not done for the claimants all that could possibly be done in giving them a fair field to assert their rights.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to my friend from Alabama to strike it out out of more abundant caution.

Mr. MORGAN. That is for the Senate to say, but that is why the committee put it in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Oregon to yield to me to let me make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts with reference to the point he has just made.

Mr. DOLPH. I have yielded the floor to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and leave the matter entirely to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the last four lines of the bill do not entirely obviate the objection which he has made. Of course it is recognized that you do not want to go to the Supreme Court to have it render a judgment which judgment is to be disregarded; but here is a provision that—

In case said court shall decide in said suit that said La Abra Silver Mining Company, or its successors and assigns, are, in justice and equity, entitled to any part of said award that shall remain to be paid or distributed, the Secretary of State shall proceed to distribute the same to the persons entitled thereto.

Does not that give the money absolutely in payment of its judgment? If the Supreme Court renders a judgment it ought to be paid——

Mr. HOAR. The point is, the Supreme Court can not render a judgment, and the chaos will return again if we send it there. In other words, the Supreme Court of the United States have no constitutional duty or power—Congress can not give them constitutional duty or power—to say what justice and equity require of a political department of the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not as to a fund in possession of the State Department?

Mr. HOAR. No, if there is a legal obligation.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator is right about that, then I yield the point.

Mr. HOAR. That is the proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is aware that when a suit against the United States has been adjudicated by the Court of Claims and then adjudicated on appeal to the Supreme Court, the judgment comes back to Congress for payment, and it is not paid until we appropriate for it. Now, here is a case where if the Supreme Court affirm the judgment of the Court of Claims in behalf of the La Abra Company it does not come back to Congress but the Secretary of State is under the obligation imposed by statute of the United States to pay the judgment. Therefore, it seems to me that the point which the Senator makes, that the Supreme Court is called upon to perform a duty which it can not constitutionally be asked to perform, is entirely obviated.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator fails to take, entirely, the point which I made. It was not that there was not a provision for carrying into effect what the Supreme Court of the United States should say, but that the Supreme Court could not be clothed with the duty or authority of saying what justice and equity require; and I called the attention of the Senate to the distinction between the case which the Senator from New Hampshire adverts to and this one; that where there is a legal obligation, an obligation in law or in equity treated as a branch of law, against the United States, undoubtedly the United States may consent to be a party, and the Supreme Court of the United States may be clothed with appellate jurisdiction. That is equally true whether the judgment requires an act of Congress to pay it afterwards or whether it is provided that it may be paid as a matter of duty by one of the Executive Departments of the Government. But here the committee say this is a political question, and a question to be settled according to the instructed notion of the political department in regard to what is just between the parties, and the Supreme Court of the United States can not constitutionally be asked to give opinions on such a question as that.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me I will grant that the Supreme Court can not be made the adviser of the Secretary of State or the President in a question of this character. The Supreme Court can not be made the adviser of the conscience of the Executive. I am not familiar with the report of this committee; I deal simply with the bill which is before the Senate. The bill does not say that the effect of the judgment of the court is to instruct the conscience of the Secretary of State or the President of the United States. The bill says that the effect of the decision of the court is to keep this fund and deliver it to Mexico or to pay it to these claimants.

Now, it seems to me the Senator is making a distinction without a difference when he says that because the court can not instruct the conscience of the Executive it can not adjudicate as to the rights of these parties to a sum of money that is in the manual possession of the Government, held in trust for somebody.

Mr. HOAR. But the committee go on the ground that the parties have not rights. That is the trouble. Suppose we were to pass a law that in consideration of the long, faithful, and able services of the Senator from New Hampshire there should be paid to him such sum of money as the Supreme Court of the United States should think reasonable, or that the Court of Claims should think reasonable, and on appeal would the Supreme Court of the United States entertain jurisdiction of that? Would they entertain jurisdiction any more if it were said that the money was to be instantly paid by the Secretary of the Treasury when the Supreme Court had made their decision?

Suppose we should pass a law that all pensioners might go into the Court of Claims and having shown the character of their military services and their need, the Court of Claims should be authorized to say what would be a reasonable pension to be paid to each of those persons or to each class of persons, and that there should be an appeal on the part of the United States or on the part of the claimant to the Supreme Court, and that when the Supreme Court had made its decision then the Secretary of the Interior should put the name of the person affected on the pension roll, and the pension should be paid from the Treasury without further act of Congress, would anybody hold that the Supreme Court would be bound to accept, or would accept, or should accept, the duty so imposed upon them?

The proposition, I repeat, is not that there is any difficulty in getting the judgment of the Supreme Court paid under the mechanism contrived in the bill. The proposition is that the decision of the Supreme Court is not to be under the bill a declaration of a legal or equitable right, but they are asked to declare what ought to be done in justice. I use the words justice and equity; the term equity, noscitur e sociis, means according to a general notion of what is just and reasonable under the circumstances. So, you have not got a decision of what the Constitution describes as a case, which means a controversy as to a legal right.

Now, the Senator from New Hampshire does not answer that at all in his remark. He does not make any remarks which indicate that I have made it clear to his mind. The Senator from New Hampshire supposes me to object to this bill that there is something to be done after the Supreme Court get through with it which prevents it from being a case under the Constitution. That is not the trouble. If the money were paid into the Treasury and were to be taken from the Treasury by a warrant, certified by the clerk of the Supreme Court, my point would remain unaffected. It is that this is either a legislative or a political discretion, one or the other. The question whether this award shall be paid back to Mexico, or shall be paid to the present owners of the interest of the La Abra Company or the Wier claim, is a question, as the committee say, and as Chief Justice Fuller said, of political discretion. It is a political discretion, to be determined either by the President directing the Secretary of State, or it is to be determined by Congress, as it undoubtedly may be determined by Congress acting legislatively, and such a question as that can not constitutionally be imposed upon the Supreme Court.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have but a few remarks to make. By the treaty of July 4, 1868, the American and Mexican Commission was constituted to hear a large number of claims. Among them were two, called now the Weil and the La Abra claims. The award in those two cases amounted to $1,159,000. Upon that approximately half was paid. I do not pretend to give the exact figures, but something like $600,000 is still nominally due upon those claims.

But now the United States Government, having come into the unexpected possession of certain evidence, finds that those claims were from top to bottom, side to side, fraudulent. I accept the judgment to this effect of those gentlemen of the committee and others who have closely investigated the question. It is impossible for each individual Senator to enter upon the long investigation that would be necessary to come to a conclusion upon such a question of fact. I accept the decision that those claims were wholly fraudulent. Now, the question is, what shall the United States do with the six hundred and odd thousand dollars remaining in its hands?

I am very glad and proud to say that the judgment of the Senate upon this question has not been uncertain. By a large majority it has said more than once that it desires to give back this money to Mexico. Is it necessary to argue that that is the course all honorable gentlemen would take? It seems to me the question does not admit of argument, and therefore I cheerfully vote for whatever measure may be pending aiming towards that result, and I shall vote myself for the pending bill.

But it happens to be within my power to give an illustration of how Mexico is acting under a somewhat similar case, that is to say, a case depending purely upon a national sense of honor and not upon law or legal obligation. When this original Commission was constituted, one of my constituents, the State bank of Hartford, having become in the collection of debts due it the possessor of certain claims against Mexico for arms furnished, filed its claim. The Commission decided that it had no jurisdiction, whereupon the State bank dropped the matter.

By the terms of the treaty of July 4, 1868, this among other claims was barred; in the language of that treaty, barred and thenceforth inadmissible. It was also expressly barred and excluded from settlement and payment by the domestic legislation of Mexico. But by and by the State Bank, feeling that its claim was entirely equitable, and it being admitted by the Mexican Government that the arms in question had been delivered, ventured to make another presentation of the case, barred by treaty, barred by statute, thrown out of court by the Mexican Claims Commission. The Mexican Government took it up, admitted the justice of it, paid it, $35,000, in securities for which it had to pay 33 per cent premium, such being the difference in the currency of Mexico and the United States.

Mr. President, that is a fine example. I think that I must for myself endeavor to reciprocate the honorable and among its private citizens the gentlemanly conduct of the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to discuss at this time the power of Congress to impose upon the Supreme Court of the United States the duty of taking jurisdiction of an appeal from any decision which might be rendered by the Court of Claims under the provisions of this bill. I have not examined the authorities, and my colleague upon the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. MORGAN], who had charge of these claims long prior to the time when I became a member of the committee, will discuss that proposition of law at the proper time.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Oregon excuse me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DOLPH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. The proposition which has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts occurred to me in reading the bill; in other words, that any duty which belongs exclusively to the political department of the Government can not be imposed upon the judicial branch. But I would ask the Senator if the question as to whether the judgment is fraudulent does not possess such elements of litigation, or, in other words, if it is not such a case as that by the voluntary act of the United States in entering the Court of Claims and litigating the question with the parties who claim the award the United States Supreme Court would take jurisdiction of it by appeal as a case, as a litigation, as a controversy which has been inaugurated by the act of the United States Government?

Suppose, for instance, that a question of distribution should arise, two parties claiming this award. That, too, would be a political duty, in the first instance, of the executive branch of the Government to settle; but suppose an act was passed which should authorize the United States Government to give relief to the parties claiming this award in the Court of Claims and to bring a suit of this description, would not an appeal lie to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment which had been rendered? I mention this, because it seems to me that it would be far more satisfactory, if it can be done constitutionally, to have this matter progress to the court of last resort, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I never like to discuss a legal proposition without being fully advised in regard to it, and when I do have to discuss such a proposition I generally exhaust all the means of information upon it that are within my power. I therefore propose to leave the discussion of the legal question which has been raised by the Senator from Massachusetts to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who will speak upon this measure and on a bill involving another award made at the same time and by the same Commission. But I will say that I am disposed to agree with the Senator who has just interrogated me.

Here is a sum of money which has been paid by the Government of Mexico, and now under the control of the Secretary of State. The question primarily as to what shall be done with it may be purely a political question, but I doubt very much whether any President or any Secretary of State would feel at liberty to refund this money to the Government of Mexico without some authority from Congress for doing so.

To meet the difficulty it is proposed by the committee in reporting this bill that the United States, the Government, the Administration, shall cause to be instituted a suit to determine what shall be done with this fund. As has been suggested by the Senator, to submit this sum of money to abide the event of litigation, the decision of the courts, and it is provided that if certain facts are found by the Court of Claims, in the first instance, and by the Supreme Court of the United States as the court of last resort, to wit, if it shall be found that this award was procured by fraud and false testimony or other false and fraudulent practices, and that the Government of the United States was imposed upon, then the money shall be returned by the Secretary of State to the Government of Mexico. But if it shall be found that the award was not secured by fraud, by false testimony, and by fraudulent practices, then the Secretary of State shall proceed and distribute this money to the La Abra Silver Mining Company or its assigns, the parties authorized to receive it, and jurisdiction is conferred by the bill to determine that question of fact and to determine what disposition is to be made of the money.

I am under the impression that the Supreme Court under this proposed act can and would take jurisdiction of this question and determine it. But I do not see that it is very important to either the claimants or the Government that this case should go to the Supreme Court of the United States, and personally I should be quite willing to see the third section stricken out of the bill. I would not propose to have it done or agree to its being done, of course, without a consultation with the committee of which I am a member and under whose direction I reported the bill, but it seems to me that for the information of the Government, for the guidance of the executive department, an examination, an adjudication, and decision by the Court of Claims is just as good as if the Supreme Court were to pass upon the case, to pass upon a mere question of fact. I think that the permission to these claimants to go into the Court of Claims and submit their cause that is all that is required.

But I say as to the legal proposition made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I shall not undertake the discussion of it at this time. If I choose to add anything to the discussion after it has been presented by the Senator from Alabama, I will do so.

There has been another suggestion made to me by a Senator, which, on account of his legal learning and his knowledge of this case, deserves some attention, and that is, that there ought to be an omission of the word "or," in the thirteenth line of the first section. I see no objection to that myself, although I do not attach as much importance to it as the gentleman I refer to does. The section reads:

> To determine whether the award made by the United States and Mexican Mixed Commission in respect to the claim of the said La Abra Silver Mining Company was obtained, as to the whole sum included thereln or as to any part thereof, by fraud or false swearing or other false and fraudulent practices

I should be quite willing myself to leave out the word "or" or to insert the word "and" in place of "or."

Mr. MORGAN. Where it first occurs?

Mr. DOLPH. Where it first occurs in the section; and if that would obviate any objection that any Senator has to this bill, at the proper time, if the motion to amend is made, so far as I am concerned I shall be quite willing to consent to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the criticism is entirely grammatical. I do not know what else it could be.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator I have reference to supposed that the case ought not to be reopened and retried unless such a case were presented as would authorize a court to reopen its own judgment or the judgment of another court for fraud; that mere false swearing alone is not sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go any further into the questions of law arising upon the consideration of this bill. I think the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which I quoted from at length, settles conclusively the power and the right of Congress to do what we are proposing to do by this bill.

I express my regret again that I am not able to have in print before me the long and able speech of the Senator from Missouri, but I do not propose to go through all this testimony and into every collateral issue which has been raised in this case before the Mixed Commission and before the State Department and before the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not consider it necessary.

It is alleged here by the committee, and stated in the report which I had the honor to submit in the Fiftieth Congress, that this award was secured by fraud and by false testimony and by fraudulent practices; that it was founded in fraud. I stated to the Senator from Missouri, and also said when I opened the discussion upon the bill, that if that proposition were denied I would make it appear from testimony which had been taken in this case, which could not be controverted, that it was true, and that is what I propose to do. I could not undertake to follow the Senator in all that he has stated, in all the quotations he has made from the false and perjured testimony which was before the Mixed Commission. I could not follow him in regard to all the extracts from the testimony of witnesses which appear to favor in a general way the claim that there had been some mistreatment of this company by Mexico, or that the Government or people of Mexico were unfavorable to American citizens.

I submit to the Senate that it is wholly immaterial to show that some Mexican citizen, in conversation with some of the agents or employés of this company, manifested hostility towards the Government of the United States or the people of the United States, or even to show that there was a general sentiment of hostility on the part of the Mexicans towards the Americans. It is equally immaterial to show that these claimants had a mine in Mexico or that they worked a mine in Mexico, or even that it was a valuable mine; or unless something more is shown; unless it is shown that they lost their property by the fault of Mexico. The charge made in this case is that these people, the owners of this mine, were deprived of their property by the Government of Mexico or the people of Mexico; that they lost their mine on account of the hostility of the Mexican people to Americans, and to this company in particular; and unless that can be established there is no foundation whatever for this claim.

If this company was not deprived of the possession of its mines, if it did not cease to work its mines, if their property was not destroyed or lost to them by the action of the Mexican Government, all these other questions are immaterial; the Government of Mexico never was liable to these people, and when they made claims against the Mexican Government it was an imposition upon the United States, and it was a fraud upon the Government of Mexico.

Now, I propose to quote at considerable length in this case from the letters of the superintendents of this company at the mines during the times the company were in possession and working these mines, and from some of the letters of the officers of this company to its superintendents and agents at the mines to establish what I propose to show. As a convenient way of submitting the facts to the Senate in regard to this matter, I will quote from the report which I had the honor to submit upon this bill, and then refer to the testimony to show that what I state is substantiated by the testimony. I read from the report:

The testimony taken by the committee is sufficient to establish beyond question the authenticity of the letterpress copy book of La Abra Company presented to the Secretary of State by the Mexican Government. It was identified before the committee by one of the superintendents of the company, Col. Julius A. De Lagnel—

Senators will recollect that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] stated substantially that Mr. De Lagnel was a man of truth and veracity, whose testimony, it was claimed on both sides, could be relied upon—as the press copy book in use at the mines in Tayoltita, Mexico, during the time he was superintendent of the company's works, and he identified all the press copies of the letters signed by himself. The press copies of letters signed by Charles H. Exall, the superintendent who succeeded De Lagnel, and the press copies of the letters of James Granger and certain statements of his handwriting in the same book, as also the original letters of David J. Garth, the treasurer of the company, and of Charles H. Exall, were duly proved by competent witnesses to be genuine.

I propose to establish that proposition. We have genuine letters here, and when I show that they are the genuine letters of agents and officers of this corporation I shall refer to them to show what the exact facts are in regard to this mine. They are witnesses which can not be impeached; they are witnesses who do not lie, and the facts which appear from these letters can be relied upon.

I refer now to De Lagnel's testimony on pages 6, 10, 11, and 12 of the Appendix, which Senators will see if they have the report before them.

Julius A. de Lagnel sworn and examined.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Please state your name, residence, and occupation.
A. At this time?
Q. Yes.
A. My name is Julius Adolphus de Lagnel. I reside in Alexandria, Va.—

Convenient here—

am at present without any fixed occupation, and live upon the little means I have. My age is sixty-two, nearly; passed sixty-one.
Q. What has been your occupation in the past, briefly?
A. From 1847 until 1861 I was an officer of the Second Artillery, United States Army. From the summer of 1861 until April, 1865, I served the Confederate States. Early in 1866—I think it was January—I was introduced to Mr. David J. Garth and recommended to him for a position, and was with the La Abra Company from early in 1866 to the spring of 1867. I think it was about September or early fall of 1868 until the spring of 1870 I was in the employ of Marshal O. Roberts, of New York, as purser on a steamer between New York and Fernandina, Fla. Then, in the fall of 1870, I was sent by Mr. Allen McLain, president of the Pacific Mail Company, to California.

You see this is a man of experience, once an officer of the United States Army, who also served in the Confederate army during the war, and he had been employed as purser on ocean steamships and in other responsible business positions.

Another question:

Q. As superintendent of the La Abra Mining Company, state whether you had charge of the property and books of the company at the mine.
A. Upon arrival Gen. Bartholow turned over everything to me in the shape of books and property, and I was recognized as in charge until the time I left.
Q. Who was Gen. Bartholow?
A. Gen. Bartholow was the former superintendent.

Now you have the statement of the time which this witness was in the employment of this company and his position, and that he succeeded Gen. Bartholow.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was—

Not to dwell too long upon this testimony—

The CHAIRMAN. The question was: "I want to know if the letters signed J. A. de Lagnel, from page 69 to 153, are yours. By whom are they written? Take them in a lump, and if there are any you have doubt about, probably the shortest way is to refer to them. Take it between those pages, with such exceptions as you choose to make." Now, you can proceed with your answer.
A. The letter on page 100, I think, was written by Norton.
Q. Will you explain who Norton is?
A. He was an employé, and spoke Spanish, and wrote for me in Spanish. I wrote for him in English and he would write it in Spanish.
Q. He was an employé of the company?
A. Yes, sir. Page 101 is written by Norton. Page 125 is very indistinct, but I think it is mine. Page 137 is very imperfect, but I think it is mine. Page 138 is Norton's. Page 144, neither written nor signed by me, but from the signature and position in the book think it to be undoubtedly Exall's.

Mr. GEORGE. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. Julius De Lagnel, superintendent of the mines for over a year. He is a man who can be relied upon.

Mr. MORGAN. A man who was there during the period when it was said all these difficulties occurred.

Mr. DOLPH.—

All the other letters—

Now listen—

All the other letters contained within the book between those numbers named are mine.

Mr. GEORGE. Not Exall's.

Mr. DOLPH. Not Exall's. We have not got to Exall's. We prove them by another witness.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Was Granger an employé of the company during the time you remained there?
A. I do not think I was paying him any salary. He had been living at the hacienda ever since his arrival, at first as a guest, and, needing a bookkeeper, he being an experienced one, acted in that capacity; but I anticipated that Mr. Exall would take him regularly into his employ and give him a salary. I do not recollect ever making any engagement. If I did so it has escaped me.

Granger is the man who was left in charge of the mine when Exall left the mine. It was turned over to Granger by a formal letter when Exall left.

Q. State whether the letter book, from the beginning up to page 153, appears now in the same state in which it was when you left the mine.
A. Do you want me to examine this letter by letter?
Q. No; the general condition of the book.
The CHAIRMAN. Examine it so that you are satisfied you can make a correct answer to the question.
The WITNESS. Well, the only way is to examine the pages. [After examination.] Yes, sir; I find the original numbers all in and nothing inserted.

Now we have the letter books that contain copies of letters written by De Lagnel and some written by other persons in his employment during the year he was there.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Are those letters written by De Lagnel the letters upon which the Senator relies to show the fraudulent character of the claim?

Mr. DOLPH. They are in part. There are also other letters which are proved in the same way.

Mr. MORGAN. And we have his statement.

Mr. DOLPH. And we have his statement in the testimony here.

Mr. GEORGE. Are they as pertinent to the question as those written by Exall?

Mr. DOLPH. Quite as pertinent. I will read what Mr. Foster says to the same witness on page 11.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. To whom did you deliver the letter book when you left the mine?
A. I take it for granted, without recollecting, that I gave it to Mr. Exall. It is the only thing I would have done. I do not remember the occurrence, but I must have given it to him with all the books together in the desk.

By Mr. STAPLES:

Q. You have no recollection on that subject?
A. No, sir.

By Senator DOLPH:

Q. You did not take it away?
A. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. GEORGE. He was the predecessor of Exall as superintendent.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes; he was the predecessor of Exall as the superintendent of the mine.

Q. You did not take it away?
A. No, sir; I did not.
Q. Or deliver it to anybody else?

A. No, sir; I never took the book out of the office where it was kept from the time I received it until the time I left.
Q. You turned the property over to Mr. Exall. How did you do it?
A. I made receipts, an inventory of the property, and turned it over to him.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Have you preserved any of those receipts or invoices, or did they remain in your possession?
A. No, sir; I gave the papers I brought home to Mr. Garth.

Mr. Garth was the treasurer of the company. He was before the committee and was examined at length, but all the papers and books in New York were alleged to have been lost. Those we could not get.

Mr. GEORGE. Was the treasurer located in New York?

Mr. DOLPH. He was located in New York.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When was that?
A. That, I think, was in the month of May; it must have been May, 1867.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. You will please examine the letters in the front of this letter book attached to your deposition given in San Francisco, dated May 10, 1867; May 20, 1867; May 30, 1867; June 10, 1867; July 10, 1867; July 20, 1867; August 10, 1867; October 10, 1867, and state if you know by whom they were written and signed.
A. (After examinging the letters.) All of these letters that I hold in my hand that have been named were written and signed by Mr. Garth.

The treasurer of the company. Those are original letters.

Mr. GEORGE. Found in Mexico?

Mr. DOLPH. Found with the letter book.

Mr. GEORGE. In Mexico.

Mr. DOLPH. In Mexico. I now refer to the testimony of Mr. Tuttle, on pages 23 and 24 of the appendix to the report of the committee. Mr. Tuttle states:

My name is William P. Tuttle; age 45; residence, Madison, N. J.; occupation, banker and broker, New York City.

He was brought to prove the handwriting of Exall.

Senator DOLPH. The examination will proceed.
The WITNESS. I would say that all the letters that purport to be written by Mr. Exall are most unmistakably in his handwriting. There are a few statements here which are in another handwriting.

The foundation had been laid for this testimony. This gentleman had been in the employ of Exall, or at least he was familiar with his handwriting:

They show themselves, and there is another letter; there is a letter from another party, but those that are in there purporting to be his handwring are most unmistakably his.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Those that have the signature C. H. or Charles H. Exall?
A. The signature is correct, and, as nearly as I can judge, the handwriting is his.

There were some other letters he did not swear to; but he said the signatures were undoubtedly Exall's, and the handwriting he thought was Exall's.

I also refer to Garth's testimony, who was the treasurer of the company, which is found on page 128 of the appendix.

Mr MORGAN. He lived in New York and remained there. He was a large stockholder.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask another question. Has the Senator read the letters upon which he relies?

Mr. DOLPH. No, I have not read any letters yet.

Mr. GEORGE. Do you propose to read them?

Mr. DOLPH. I propose to read from them. I am now establishing the proposition that these letters are proved by uncontradicted testimony to be genuine letters.

Mr. GEORGE. Then you do propose to read them?

Mr. DOLPH. I propose to read from them to show the fraudulent character of this claim.

This is from Mr. Garth, the former treasurer of the company, and he, being a party in interest, was placed on the stand by the committee and examined in order to find out where the papers were and to get from him such information as we could get concerning this affair:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I wish to identify some letters we have here which purport to be original letters written by David J. or D. J. Garth [handing witness the press-copy book]. I would be glad if you would look over that batch just in front and see if they are in your handwriting. Examine each one carefully and then, after you get through, state which of those letters are in your handwriting.
A. (After examining letters.) These are all written by me, in my handwriting.
Mr. SHELLABARGER. Name them over by their dates and place so that we will get it in the record.
The WITNESS. There is one May 10, 1867.

By Mr. DOLPH:

Q. Who is it addressed to?
A. To Mr. Charles H. Exall. One of May 20, 1867.
Mr. SHELLABARGER. State in each case where they are dated at and to whom addressed.
The WITNESS. This of May 10 is dated in New York, and directed to Charles H. Exall, Tayoltita, Mexico. This of May 20, 1867, is directed to the same party at the same place. This of May 30 is from the same point, New York, to Charles H. Exall, Tayoltitia, Mexico. This of June 10 is to the same party, from the same place. This of July 10, 1867, to the same party at the same place. This of July 20, 1867, is directed to the same party, at the same place. This from New York, August 10, is to Charles H. Exall, at Tayoltita, Mexico. This from New York, October 10, 1867, is to Charles H. Exall, Tayoltita, Mexico. I believe that is all that I see.

I think I need not go further to establish the proposition that these letters I propose to read have been shown to be genuine. They are sworn to be genuine, those written by Mr. De Lagnel, by the writer himself. As to those written by Mr. Exall, the handwriting of Exall is proved by a banker and broker of New York familiar with his handwriting; and the authorship of the letters signed by D. J. Garth, and written to the agents of the company at the mines, are identified by Mr. Garth. So these letters are identified by the parties who wrote them. There is no question about it, and no man will have the hardihood to deny that they are genuine. I read again from the report:

D. J. Garth, the former treasurer of La Abra Company, and the agent of the company who conducted its business in New York and the company's correspondence with the superintendents of the company's works in the mines at Tayoltita during the operations of the company there, in his testimony before the committee, admitted the receipt of the originals of nearly all of the letters addressed to him, written by De Lagnel and Exall, and copied in the press copy book, together with the genuineness of the letters purporting to have been written by himself.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to this paper. Mr. Garth on the stand admitted the receipt of nearly all these letters, the copies of which were found in the letterpress book and were identified by De Lagnel.

Mr. GEORGE. That he got them in New York?

Mr. DOLPH. That he got them in New York. To prove that proposition I quote from the testimony of Mr. Garth, found on pages 217, 218, 829, 830, 861, and 862 of the report. I first read from page 217 of the report:

By Mr. DOLPH:

Q. There are several letters between those two pages, then?

That is between page 125 and page 126.

A. Yes, sir.
Q. Those at Mazatlan appear to have been divided instead of being between 124 and 125; part between 125 and 126, so as not to be on the same stub?
A. I suppose so.
Q. Is that the fact; just examine it and see?
A. That is the fact.
Q. Several letters in each place?
A. Yes, sir. This letter, Mazatlan, 17th of November, 1866, is a letter of 8 pages, between 125 and 126, from J. A. De Lagnel to D. J. Garth.
Q. Have you read the printed copy of that letter?
A. I don't remember doing so.

This is Mr. Garth.

Q. Well, read just sufficiently to state whether you remember having received it?
A. No, sir; I do not.
Q. I wish then, as we pass, you would look at that printed copy and state whether you recollect having received that letter?
A. I recognize it by the fact that he drew upon me for $7,000, and the fact that it was paid.

That is one letter which he recognized as having received.

Q. So you are able to state that you received that letter?
A. Yes, sir; I am able to state from that fact. I recollect that draft was paid.

By Mr. MCDONALD:

Q. Well, that is in answer to five letters received by him?
A. Yes; his letter says it is in answer to them all.

That is to say, this letter of De Lagnel was a letter in answer to five received from Garth, as I understand it.

Between pages 136 and 137 I find the following: Mazatlan, December 31, 1866, to G. F. Nolte, Cosula, from J. A. De Lagnel. Mazatlan, dated 5th January, 1867, to D. J. Garth, by J. A. De Lagnel.

By Mr. DOLPH:

Q. Do you recollect receiving that letter?
A. I would have to look it over perhaps before I could say [after reading it]; yes, I know I received that letter.

Mr. GEORGE. Right there let me ask, was there any proof tending to show that any of these letters in the copy book were not received?

Mr. DOLPH. Oh, no, there was none; but I think probably there were some that could not be identified merely from memory.

Mr. GEORGE. But there was no allegation made that the letters were not received?

Mr. DOLPH. Oh, no; there was no attempt made to prove that there were any letters that appeared there that had not been mailed and properly received by the company in New York, but I am not sure that the copy of every letter found there was brought home by the recollection of something contained in it to the witness Garth and admitted to have been received by him.

Mr. GEORGE. There was no denial?

Mr. DOLPH. There was no denial that they were received.

By Mr. DOLPH:

Q. Do you recollect receiving that letter?
A. I would have to look it over perhaps before I could say [after reading it]; yes, I know I received that letter.

By Mr. MCDONALD:

Q. Following that, do you find one of January 5?
A. Mazatlan, Mexico, 5 January, 1867; to William C. Ralston, cashier, Bank of California, by De Lagnel.
Q. Between the same pages?
A. Yes, between 136 and 137.
Q. Do you find any other of the same date to the same person?
A. Another of the same date to the same person.

By Mr. SHELLABARGER:

Q. Between the same pages?
A. And between the same pages; yes, sir. Between 144 and 145 I find the following: Mazatlan, 5th February, 1867; W. C. Ralston, cashier Bank of California, by J. A. De Lagnel; and one of the same date, from the same place, to D. J. Garth, New York, by De Lagnel.

By Mr. DOLPH:

Q. Do you recognize that letter; do you remember having received it?
A. (After reading it.) Yes, I recognize that letter.

By Mr. MCDONALD:

Q. Well, pass on to the next.
A. Between pages 152 and 153 I find this: "Mazatlan, April 16, 1867; William C. Ralston, by J. A. De Lagnel." I recognize that.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that Mr. Garth's testimony still?

Mr. DOLPH. That is Garth's testimony.

Q. What do you mean to say by saying you recognize that? I will ask you whether or not all these letters referred to as having been written by De Lagnel are in his handwriting?
A. I am satisfied that they are, except where they are so indistinct that I can not make them out.
Q. Let me understand; you have no more doubt about the balance of these letters that are illegible, which purport to have been written by Mr. De Lagnel at Mazatlan, than this one you now speak of to Ralston, have you?
A. No; I think not.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain in a moment in reference to that. Very early in this controversy, after the discovery of this book, it being obtained by Mexico, it was filed in the State Department of the United States and remained there for several years.

Mr. COLQUITT. The letter book?

Mr. MORGAN. The letter book, and it was printed. A copy of the book was put in print, and in consequence of the lapse of time the ink in the original letter book in some places faded out so as to make it illegible. What the committee were trying to do when Mr. Garth was there was to fix upon his mind and through his testimony establish the fact that he had received letters which corresponded with the printed letters so as to identify these letters that could not be read conveniently, and in fact some of them could not be read at all at that time in consequence of the fading of the ink. The committee, therefore, had to go through that process of identification of the letters with the printed matter, the committee having the original letters there. We then called Garth's attention to the substance of each of these letters. While he disclaimed that he had any positive memory of the identical or particular letters which he had received, he said "I received letters containing that information about that time."

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask another question. Did De Lagnel, who wrote the letters, testify?

Mr. MORGAN. He testified to every one of them.

Mr. GEORGE. They were letters sent from New York.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. Then we printed in evidence a number of letters written by Garth and others in New York, and we tried to get the copy letter-press book that they had in New York, but could not find it. We sent for the treasurer's accounts, and any other accounts connected with the company while Garth was treasurer.

Mr. GEORGE. Right on that point I should like to have an explanation. What explanation did the company give of the disappearance of the books from New York?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] can tell that as well as I can.

Mr. DOLPH. They gave no very satisfactory explanation. They were traced from one officer of the company to another. I do not think Mr. Garth gave any satisfactory explanation for the books being out of his hands. The company, however, had really ceased business operations, failed to make its reports, and the whole property was considered as lost. The books were treated as of no account and stored away in some office of one of the ex-officers of the company, probably the secretary, and were said to have been lost and could not be found. I think that officer was dead. As one member of the committee, I was not entirely satisfied with the explanation made, and I felt, also, if the books had been in existence, it would not have been for the interest of the company or the company's agents in New York to have produced them in view of what we had already been able to get of the correspondence and transactions of the company.

Mr. GEORGE Did the committee use all the means in their power to get possession of the books and papers?

Mr. DOLPH. We did. We subpœnaed everybody who we supposed knew anything about them. They were demanded of the attorneys of the company, and every other step was taken that is known to the practice in such cases.

Mr. MORGAN. There was a subpœna duces tecum issued to every person we could hear of who had had possession or any connection with the books at all, stockholders, treasurer, and secretary. The secretary of the company was dead, and Garth was treasurer and a large stockholder. Garth kept his books and the book of correspondence in the secretary's office, and when he would write a letter in his own office he would take it to the secretary's office in New York, and there have it copied into the letter-press book.

Garth had understood that the secretary had put the books in some loft or garret somewhere and had made one or two searches for them. The attorney of the company, who had been all the time prosecuting this claim, when on the stand had an entire absence of any knowledge or recollection about the treasurer's books or any account books of the company. They had all vanished. The committee, however, used very diligent efforts to get those records brought before it, and failed entirely, which I thought and believe resulted from an effort on the part of the company to conceal the evidence.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the Senator aware of any effort being made by any person connected with that company in New York to find those books and produce them before the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. None, except what they testified to themselves on their examination as to why the books were not produced.

Mr. DOLPH. I will not follow up the question of showing the genuineness of the letters. I think they are shown to be genuine beyond controversy, and no Senator and no party interested will attempt to call attention to any testimony that appears in this volume relating to the case to show that these letters are not genuine letters.

Before I undertake to show what a fraud this claim was, I desire to ask attention to what was claimed in this case in order that I may contrast the facts and the evidence which has been taken in the case with the claim made before the Mixed Commission. To show how gigantic and how complete this fraud is it is necessary to show what was claimed by this company. Exall, who is the man who has been denounced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and who, it is claimed, was in the conspiracy to obtain this mine from these people in New York, was the man upon whose testimony largely this award was made. He was the moving spirit. I think he was the originator and discoverer of the plan to make the claim against Mexico.

That company represented in its memorial—

Found on pages 328 and 329 of the report of the committee. I am now quoting from the report—

That company represented in its memorial before the Joint Commission that it purchased in 1865, in Tayoltita, State of Durango, Mexico, certain silver mines of great value and extraordinary richness; that it sent intelligent agents to Mexico and made heavy and judicious expenditures on its mining property, to wit, over $300,000; that it had extracted a large amount of the richest ore; that it was subjected to threats, robberies, seizure and confiscation by the authorities of mule trains and supplies, forced loans, onerous taxes, imprisonment of its superintendent, murder of one of its officials, and other acts of violence, persecution, and interference by the Mexican civil and military authorities and people; that on account of these persecutions, outrages, and insecurity it was impossible to work the mines, and it was compelled to abandon them (in March, 1868).

Mind, March, 1868.

Mr. COLQUITT. Three years.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, since 1865. The time is fixed, I think, in Exall's deposition, I will say in passing, on the 30th of March, 1868. This date will become important as we proceed in the examination of the facts of this case.

Mr. GEORGE. The date when they alleged they gave up the mines?

Mr. DOLPH. The date when they turned over the affairs and abandoned the mine.

That in consequence of the forced abandonment the mines and buildings, of the value of $1,000,000.

Senators will recollect that the company had already stated that they had expended $300,000, and it will be seen directly how that was expended, how exaggerated these statements were, though that is not material unless other facts are established—and the silver ore extracted, amounting to 1,000 tons, of the value of $500,000, were wholly lost to the company; that, if permitted to work the mines, the clear annual profits would have been $1,000,000; and that by the forced abandonment the company was utterly ruined. Damages were claimed to the amount of $3,030,000, and the award was rendered for $683,041.30.

I will not stop to read from the memorial. The committee states it, and there can be no question but that it is taken from the memorial of the company. The memorial is found printed in this volume on pages 328 and 329, and any Senator can refer to it and see that the statement of the company before the Mixed Commission in their memorial is properly referred to in this report. The committee say:

At the time of the alleged forced abandonment no complaint whatever was made to the Department of State at Washington, to the Mexican Government, nor to the United States minister at the City of Mexico.

Mr. MORGAN. No claim was ever filed in any place at the time.

Mr. DOLPH. No claim was ever made to our Government for these alleged injuries.

Mr. GEORGE. At any time?

Mr. DOLPH. At any time until it was made to the Mixed Commission.

Mr. MORGAN. The first appearance of the claim was before the commissioners while they were in session, late in the progress of their investigation. Nobody knew about it until then.

Mr. DOLPH. The committee proceed to say:

It appears from the evidence before the committee that after the last superintendent returned to New York, in May, 1868, and made his report, the officers and directors of La Abra Mining Company took no steps to protect or recover possession of their property in Mexico; sent no agent there to look after or inquire into its condition, and did nothing whatever to maintain their rights. The claims convention with Mexico of July 4, 1868, was proclaimed February 1, 1869, and the memorial of La Abra Company was not filed before the Commission till June 14, 1870, more than two years after the abandonment of the mines.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator pardon me one moment?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly. It does not interfere with me a particle.

Mr. MORGAN. I will call attention to the condition of affairs there at that time. Our civil war ended in 1865. The Mexican civil war ended late in the year 1867 or the beginning of 1868 in the death of Maximilian. The period of time covered by the negotiation between the United States Government and Mexico in respect of the claims which existed mutually amongst the people of the respective governments, one against the other, was from about March, 1868, until July, 1868. The La Abra Company abandoned these mines, and it so avers in its petition, pending negotiations before the convention was signed, but while the whole country knew that the convention was in process of construction.

Mr. GEORGE. At the date when they alleged they were obliged to abandon the mine.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. The convention was signed on the 4th day of July, 1868, and that furnished a convenient opportunity for this company, as the committee believe from the evidence, to recoup all its losses by presenting a claim against the Mexican Government to the Mixed Commission, and they delayed until 1870 before they presented any claim at all, having made no complaint to the United States Government, none to Mexico, and none to any authority whatsoever. The first appearance of that claim was upon these affidavits being lodged in that Commission without their having received a particle of supervision on the part of any officer of any government whatever.

Mr. GEORGE. On that statement I should like to ask the Senator a question. How did the Joint Commission take jurisdiction of this claim? As I remember reading the treaties they could only take jurisdiction of claims which had been presented to the Government of the United States, and they were to be presented by the Government to the Commission. How did that happen?

Mr. MORGAN. When I come to take the floor on this question I shall read the report of the secretary of the Commission, which shows how these claims were presented and how they were considered. There were very nearly or quite two thousand claims presented to the Commission, involving claims against the Government of Mexico of upwards of $400,000,000. The claims on the part of the people of Mexico amounted to, perhaps—I forget the exact figures—some $20,000,000, or something like that. The mass of the claims was very great, and there was scarcely a claim that was considered by that Commission from beginning to end that had received the supervision of either of the Governments. They were presented raw, in any form that the claimants saw proper to present them in that Commission. They were tumbled in by hundreds and hundreds, and many of them were presented very late in the progress of the investigation by the Commission.

So much were the dockets crowded in this way that there had to be two extensions of the convention, one by the action of the commissioners, which was provided for in the original convention itself, and another by a convention between the two Governments, in order to make room for the great volume of claims thus tumbled in upon the Commission.

In connection with this subject, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me one moment, I protest, as I have done since I have been in this body and connected with the Committee on Foreign Relations, that we ought to raise a select committee on the claims of citizens of the United States against foreign countries, and no claim ought to be permitted to be presented by the Government of the United States against any foreign country, under any convention, until it has undergone an investigation upon the part of a committee either of the House or of the Senate, or of both.

The trouble in this whole business is that the opportunity for the grossest perjury that the human tongue and pen and heart ever perpetrated in the history of mankind has been afforded by the laxity of the proceeding before this Commission, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] suggests, in utter violation of the terms of the convention.

Mr. GEORGE. Right there allow me a word. If the statement made by the Senator from Alabama is correct, as I have no doubt it is, it raises a very serious question in my mind as to the jurisdiction of the Commission to render any award at all. I have a memorandum, which I will read, taken from the treaty, that claims only shall be presented to the Commission—I now quote literally—"which shall have been presented to each Government for its interposition."

So the view which the Senator from Alabama insists is the correct one, that claims should first undergo the supervision of the respective governments, was provided for in the treaty. According to that statement these claims were tumbled in and put in there without prior sanction or supervision of the Government of the United States, in direct violation of the express terms of the treaty itself.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say that the Committee on Foreign Relations did not consider that question, for the reason that the Congress of the United States enacted a law, which was signed by the President in June, 1872, for the purpose of distributing the awards under this convention, thereby affirming and ratifying fully the regularity of the proceedings and waiving, of course, all informalities and actions theretofore, and the committee felt they were bound, as the Government of the United States had felt bound, to consider those awards as being entirely unobjectionable upon any question of practice that prevailed before the Commission and the Government of Mexico had conceded the validity of the awards as an engagement between the two Governments in compliance with the convention, and it has gone on faithfully, with entire punctuality, to pay every installment until the last installment has been paid and is now in the subtreasury at New York.

Mr. GEORGE. Mexico has not defaulted in the payment.

Mr. MORGAN. Never for a single moment.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator who has the floor is willing, I should like to move an adjournment.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not know that I can object to an adjournment at this time. I could hardly finish my remarks in justice to this case to-night, but I beg the Senate to understand that I have given way to several Senators during my remarks and have not occupied the entire time since I first took the floor. I shall conclude at my earliest convenience to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 21, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1892.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STONE of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The introduction and reference of bills was then continued under the order above adopted, as follows:

SETTLERS ON THE DES MOINES RIVER LANDS, IOWA.

By Mr. DOLLIVER: A bill (H. R. 4327) to indemnify the settlers upon the so-called Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

By Mr. TERRY: A bill (H. R. 4328) to provide for the improvement of the building and grounds of the United States court and post-office at Little Rock, Ark.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

EXTRA COPIES OF LAWS RELATING TO CURRENCY, ETC.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print 10,000 extra copies of the laws relating to loans, currency, etc., and that the compilation be brought up to and include the acts of the Fifty-first Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object, and I ask the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection it will be so referred.

There was no objection.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The introduction and reference of bills was then continued under the order above adopted, as follows:

HARBOR DEFENSE, SAN DIEGO, CAL.

By Mr. BOWERS: A bill (H. R. 4329) authorizing the Secretary of War to obtain lands for site for military post and harbor defense at San Diego, Cal., and making an appropriation therefor—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LICENSE OF A PIER, CHICAGO RIVER.

By Mr. DURBOROW: A bill (H. R. 4330) to repeal H. R. No. 104, first session Fifty-first Congress, granting to the Secretary of War a permit to license to use a pier at mouth of Chicago River—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ADDITIONAL COPIES CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution for reference, which I wish to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it a request for the consideration of the resolution or simply that it be read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Simply that it be read and referred.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not for present consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not for present consideration. The Chair asked if there was objection to its introduction for reference. After that it was the right of the gentleman, the Chair thinks, to have it read.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to know if it will appear in the RECORD if it is read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, in the case of a resolution or bill simply introduced for reference.

The Clerk then reported the title of the resolution, which is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 64) calling for additional copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for each member of the Fifty-second Congress.

The resolution was then read at length, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ANN ARBOR, MICH.

By Mr. GORMAN: A bill (H. R. 4331) providing for a public building at Ann Arbor, Mich.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SURVEY OF LITTLE WABASH AND EMBARRAS RIVERS, ILL.

By Mr. FITHIAN: A bill (H. R. 4332) providing for a survey of Little Wabash and Embarras Rivers, Ill.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ALEXANDER SAMPSON.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, in the deficiency appropriation bill of the Fifty-first Congress certain relief was granted "James" Sampson in relation to some land in the State of Washington. In that bill, by pure mistake or accident, the name was "James" Simpson, whereas it should have been "Alexander" Sampson. I have prepared a bill to correct that mistake, and it does not require unanimous consent to introduce it, being a private bill; but there is some question as to which committee it ought properly to go. As the Committee on Appropriations have had that matter in charge, and are familiar with all the facts, I ask that the bill be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the reference indicated by the gentleman from Iowa will be made. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that that bill goes through the petition box.

PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

By Mr. RICHARDSON (by request): A bill (H. R. 4333) for the relief of certain property in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MONEYS DEPOSITED IN NATIONAL BANKS.

DISPOSITION OF BOOKS AND PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

By Mr. BUSEY: A bill (H. R. 4335) to authorize the disposal of books and public documents now on hand—to the Committee on Printing.

REPEAL OF ACT ESTABLISHING PARK IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

By Mr. BARWIG: A bill (H. R. 4336) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the establishing of a park in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DOAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill (H. R. 345) fixing a uniform standard of grain. It affects only the quality of grain, and heretofore such matters have been referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In these matters of change of reference members require the reading of the bill, and the Chair will be obliged if the gentleman will send forward a copy of the bill, or will recognize the gentleman later for that purpose.

PARK IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House that the bill H. R. 2777, which was erroneously referred to the Committee on Appropriations yesterday, be rereferred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAYERS. What bill was that, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the reference made of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report, be changed from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2777) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the establishment of a park in the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. SAYERS. A moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the House, that, as the Chair remembers, this bill was originally referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and on yesterday unanimous consent was asked to change the reference from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Appropriations. Is the Chair correct in his impression?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And then the reference was made to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not understand what that bill is.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri that it is simply a bill to repeal the act in relation to establishing a park in the District of Columbia. It does not carry a dollar of appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. DOCKERY. I misunderstood the character of the bill. I have no objection.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I object.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that it does not take a single dollar from the Treasury. The bill belongs to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I withdraw the objection, as I objected under a misapprehension.

Mr. BARWIG. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina requests that the bill, the title of which has been read, the reference of which, by unanimous consent, was changed yesterday from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Appropriations, be referred back to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Who objected?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which this bill on yesterday was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was put.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word upon that. This bill does not appropriate a single dollar out of the public Treasury. It is a matter that belongs to the Committee on the District of Columbia; and so far as I know there is no reason why the House should constitute a committee and then take away from it the business that properly belongs to it. This change of reference was made on yesterday without the knowledge of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and we simply ask to be put in possession of a bill that went to us under the rules.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that this bill be committed to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING, BUFFALO, N. Y.

By Mr. LOCKWOOD: A bill (H. R. 4337) to fix the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Buffalo, N. Y.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. DOAN, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 345) to provide for establishing a uniform standard for wheat, corn, oats, barley, and other grains, and for other purposes; and it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

DISTRIBUTION OF ACCUMULATED DOCUMENTS.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have considered at this time the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears from the report of the Joint Committee on Printing that there are in the basement of the Capitol and in the various Department buildings of the Government many thousand bound volumes of Government publications not belonging or apportioned to the Senators and Representatives in Congress, and which volumes are the accumulation of years; and

Whereas the Government has no use for the same, and it is desirable that these books be distributed amongst the people at an early day:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and hereby is, instructed to prepare and report a bill at an early day providing for the equitable apportionment and distribution of such bound volumes of Government publications to the Senators and Representatives of the Fifty-second Congress for distribution by them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was so referred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am directed by the Committee on the Library to report back with a substitute the joint resolution (S. R. 18) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. I ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than members of Congress shall be filled by the appointment of William Preston Johnson, of Louisiana, in place of Noah Porter, of Connecticut, resigned; and by the reappointment of Henry Coppee, of Pennsylvania, and M. C. Meigs, of Washington City, whose terms of office expire on December 26, 1891.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after resolving clause and insert the following:

"That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than members of Congress shall be filled by the appointment of William Preston Johnston, of Louisiana, in place of Noah Porter, of Connecticut, resigned, and the appointment of John B. Henderson, a citizen of the District of Columbia, in place of Montgomery C. Meigs, deceased, and by the appointment of Henry Coppée, of Pennsylvania, whose term of office expired on December 26, 1891."

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will simply say that the substitute reported by our committee puts the name of John B. Henderson, of the District of Columbia, in the place of that of Gen. Meigs, who has died since the passage of the original joint resolution of the Senate.

The substitute was agreed to.

The joint resolution as thus amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably, with an amendment, the Senate resolution proposing to print 5,000 copies of Senate bill 1694, which is known as the bankruptcy bill. I find on investigation that 5,000 copies, whether printed in bill form or document form, come within the limit of the law. If printed in bill form the cost will be $331, and if printed in document form, $187. It seems to the committee it will meet the whole demand fairly will if it shall be printed in document form, and I will move the necessary amendment when the resolution has been read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PERKINS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer is hereby instructed to print 5,000 copies of Senate bill 1694, and send them to the Senate document room.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to add, after the word "print," in the second line, the words "in document form"; so as to read:

Resolved, That the Public Printer is hereby instructed to print in document form 5,000 copies, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 1776) to constitute Newark, in the State of New Jersey, a port of immediate transportation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 1777) for the erection of a public building at Selma, Ala.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PORTSMOUTH (N. H.) DRY DOCK.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 1772) for the construction of a wooden dry dock at the United States navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the bill is referred I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I submit some brief observations on the necessity for the contemplated legislation. In the last annual report of Commodore Farquhar, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the following language can be found, in speaking of the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H.:

> The balance dry dock at this station requires extensive repairs. It is of wood and has been in constant use for forty years, but as its capacity is not beyond 3,500 tons it is useless for the larger vessels, and therefore I do not recommend that a large sum be expended upon its repairs. If this yard is to be maintained a new dry dock is required. It is believed that by taking advantage of the channel, the bottom and sides of which are between the two islands which compose this yard, closing one end and putting a gate at the other, with the necessary pumping machinery, a dock capable of docking the largest ships will be obtained at a comparatively small outlay. As this yard with its fine climate is a sanitarium for ships to go to after a cruise in the tropics to refit it is recommended that steps be taken to construct this dock by appropriating $100,000 to commence.

The bill contemplates the construction of a wooden dry dock, the chief reason for this being that wood is less liable to the effects of heat and cold than masonry, and will last longer in a variable climate like that of New England, while for expediency of repair wood is preferable, and a dock constructed of wood is more comfortable and healthful for the workmen.

The present floating dry dock at Portsmouth was built by Gilbert & Secor, of New York, for the Government, under contract signed November 11, 1848, and was completed in 1851. The extreme length of the dock is 350 feet; breadth, 105 feet; depth or height, 38 feet 3 inches; contract price, $437,325.

There can be no doubt that at the time this dock was built, and for a long time after, it was one of the best, a great piece of mechanism of its kind, and large enough to take in any ship of the naval or merchant service of that period. During the late war it did good work, handling with ease such ships as the Colorado, Franklin, Minnesota (ready for sea with everything on board), De Soto, Piscataqua, the ironclad Terror, and many other very heavy ships; the Franklin being considered at this time of sufficient weight (4,000 tons for hull alone) to be used in testing the strength of the new Simpson dry dock at the navy yard at Norfolk, Va. In connection with this dock there is a tide-water basin and a marine railway, which was also built by contract with Gilbert & Secor, the contract price for the basin and railway, including gate to basin, being $295,580. In this basin the dock is moored except when docking or undocking a ship, the natural rise of the tide at high water being sufficient to float the dock and its extra weight of ship (4,000 tons or over), while at low water the basin is nearly dry, the dock resting on a foundation of four longitudinal courses of dressed granite.

In making extensive repairs to ships in times past the railway, which is operated by hydraulic power, has been considered of great advantage, the ship to be repaired being placed in position in the dock, the dock raised and the forward gate removed; it is then floated in the basin and lowered to the granite foundation by opening a valve in the bottom, allowing the water to flow in. The ways in the dock are then connected to the ways on the land and the power applied, drawing the ship out of the dock onto the land, leaving the dock ready for use the next day if necessary. During the time the late William L. Hanscom was attached to this yard as naval constructor the old Ironsides (Constitution) was hauled out here and very extensively repaired. The old sailing frigate Franklin was also taken out on these ways, cut up, and transported overland to the ship-house near the bridge, from which the present Franklin was created, under the head of repairs. This was also the ship furnished the contractors by the Government for testing the lifting power of the dock and the pulling power of the hydraulic machinery before its acceptance.

During the rebellion there were several ships built on these ways and launched into the dock. Among them were the renowned Kearsarge, the Ossipee, Piscataqua, and ironclad Terror. Since that time many ships have been hauled out for extensive repairs, among which were the Wyoming, Monongahela, Ticonderoga, Lancaster, Omaha, and Portsmouth. The Nantasket was hauled out and cut up.

There are disadvantages in a dock of this kind. It must be evident to any person who gives the matter a thought that it is not only quite a large undertaking, but a risky one as well, to haul out of a basin into the quick waters of the Piscataqua this great mass of wood and iron, with its either side showing to the wind nearly 1,500 square yards of surface, having a draft of 8 feet and a displacement of 8,400 gross tons, and a ship of 4,000 tons weight added to it.

A sudden squall, the breaking of a hawser, or a quick fall of the tide might happen, either of which might make detention enough to cause the dock to take the ground when part way out. Should this occur when one-third or more of its length was out it would be ruined or so badly strained that it never would float again; and if the ship were not destroyed it would be a very expensive job to put it afloat. The chances are that both ship and dock would be used up. This never has happened. The mechanics who have had the handling of it have been very fortunate in this respect, but there have been several narrow escapes.

It was considered in the best days of this dock an intricate job to raise it steadily and level with a ship on it by manipulating the pumps and gates. Much more so is it now. Once three hours was ample time to remove with the pumps all the water and raise the dock with a ship on it; now it will take from five to seven hours and sometimes more. Once it could be raised with the windows opened. Now they must be closed, and the openings in the gates also closed. Once it required 1,000 tons of ballast to sink it with the gates open; now it does not require any. We must remember that wood and iron will not last forever, and that deterioration must commence in a structure of this kind, exposed to the weather as it necessarily is, as soon as the first timber is laid; and certainly forty-three years is a good old age for a dock to last and be in as good condition as this one is.

The bottom of this dock has never been seen since it was launched. Neither can it be without incurring an unwarrantable expense. The top, sides, and deck have been repaired, but the bottom, the vital part, never. At about the time this dock was built the same contractors built a sectional dock at the old Philadelphia yard and soon after built a balance dock like this one at Pensacola, Fla., and later built a sectional dock at the Mare Island navy-yard. The Pensacola dock was destroyed by fire during the rebellion. The Philadelphia dock was sold when the old yard was disposed of, and the Mare Island dock has been a bill of expense for years, and, I believe, is not used since the new dock has been in running order.

Therefore, you will observe, the Portsmouth dock has outlived them all, and can be used yet; but from its great age, its old-fashioned and obsolete pumps, its small size as compared with the new ones, being too short for long ships, and soon will be too weak for steel ones, and its great expense to handle as compared with modern docks, it has about outlived its usefulness. There is now in process of construction at Port Royal, S. C., a dock for which an appropriation of $500,000 was made. Seven hundred thousand dollars was apropriated by the last Congress for the purchase of a navy-yard site and building a dock at Port Orchard, Wash. Mare Island yard has a new stone dock, and New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk have new ones of the Simpson type. Boston has had her stone dock put in thorough repair, with new modern pumps. Portsmouth alone seems to have been neglected, and unless something is done in this matter soon the navy-yard might as well be abandoned. It will require three years after the appropriation before a dock can be got ready for use, and if commenced now it may be sadly needed before it is completed.

Why is it Portsmouth can not have a new dock as well as the rest, and especially as well as Norfolk or Port Royal? Why is it that this yard is almost closed and depleted of all material, while there are millions being spent at Norfolk, and $500,000 being expended at Port Royal preparatory to opening a navy-yard there?

I trust, Mr. President, that the bill may receive prompt, careful, and favorable consideration at the hands of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRINTING OF ANTI-OPTION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate bill 1757 be printed in bill form for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SANDERS. What is the subject-matter of the bill?

Mr. WASHBURN. It is what is known as the option bill, to prevent dealing in futures.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

SUPPLY OF CIRCULATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, that order is closed, and the Calendar will be proceeded with.

Mr. STANFORD. In pursuance of the notice heretofore given by me, I desire to call up Senate bill 1204.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1204) to provide the Government with means sufficient to supply the national want of a sound circulating medium.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the reference of the bill to the Committee on Finance, on which the Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, the bill which I have introduced to provide the Government with means sufficient to supply the national want of a sound circulating medium is the same as that introduced by me at the last session of Congress, and which was adversely reported by the Committee on Finance. The report does not seem to me to show evidence of careful consideration of the principles and truths that underlie the bill, no matter what its details may be. It appears to be rather the result of a hasty and superficial comparison, based upon a supposed similitude between this bill and measures adopted by other nations to supply the money necessary for business transactions. A careful investigation of the schemes of foreign governments, referred to by the committee, reveals the fact that they were all different in principle, and the issue of money which they provided for was based upon insufficient security.

The bill under consideration provides for the direct issue of money upon a material practically unlimited in quantity, its value based upon a standard of measurement (which may be so many grains of gold, or silver, or any convenient commodity), and the good faith and credit of a civilized nation of 65,000,000 people with a per capita power of production unequaled by any other country in the world. A comparison between this country of ours to-day and France under Louis XV, or France in 1792 when she was fighting united Europe, or between us now and the colonists struggling for independence, or between this country and the Argentine Republic, seems to me absurd. Yet the committee's chief arguments are based upon such comparisons. As well might the credit of a solvent and well-established firm of excellent character and undoubted wealth be compared with that of some profligate individual of limited means.

In its endeavors to establish a similarity between the bill now under consideration and the financial schemes of John Law, the committee quotes as follows from Law's writings:

> If a paper currency, not convertible into specie, be based or secured upon any article of value, such as land, and be issued to an extent not greater than the value in specie of such article, such paper currency shall not be depreciated in comparison to specie.

John Law's theory was one thing, his practice another; but when he wrote as above quoted he did not provide a basis for the issue of money that in any manner can compare with the basis provided for under the terms of this bill, viz, the good faith and responsibility of an enlightened Government supported by 65,000,000 of intelligent, producing people, added to a real-estate security of double the amount of money loaned. The committee in its allusion to Law's Mississippi scheme does not fully describe that stupendous bubble. It states that an immense amount of paper was issued, but omits to mention the security upon which the issue was made. This security was stock in the Mississippi Trading Company—a company that was to acquire vast tracts of land in the Mississippi Valley, trade with the Indians, and work supposed gold, silver, and copper mines, mines that had no existence. All this was in 1717, before the Indian titles were extinguished, before Daniel Boone had gone into Kentucky. It is the comparison of a shadow to a substance.

The committee further points out as an awful example the fate of the assignats or notes issued during the French Revolution. These notes were based upon the confiscated property of the clergy and nobility, who had very generally fled the country. The Republic was at that time at war with practically the whole of Europe, and distracted by internal dissensions, a large portion of its people favored the reëstablishment of the monarchy, which would mean the return of the despoiled clergy and nobles, the restoration of their property and the consequent destruction of the security on which the assignats were based. Under these circumstances is it a wonder that the assignats were not in commercial favor? Yet poor and uncertain as these assignats were, it was largely through their means that the Government of the Republic was able to face its enemies and successfully maintain itself against combined Europe. France produced neither gold nor silver; she was surrounded with enemies by land and sea, and but for her paper money must have succumbed.

The Argentine Republic issue of cedulas is another scheme to which the committee compares this bill. The two propositions are radically dissimilar. The great object which the bill now under consideration seeks to attain is the increase of money in circulation. The Argentine cedulas provided for no increase of money. In this bill it is proposed that the Government receive two per cent in interest on the money it issues directly; in the Argentine, the Government guarantied interest on the bonds issued by the bank in return for the mortgage on the lands. Moreover, the Argentine lands were not assessed at their value prior to the passage of the cedula enactment, but on a fresh assessment made after its enactment. The consequence was fraud. I have been informed that upon a farm worth $7,500 there was loaned $250,000. Nevertheless, the prosperity of the Argentine Republic within the last ten years has been unexampled, while its troubles certainly can not be traced solely to its schemes of land loans.

The committee has also alluded to the Continental money of our fathers, issued during a revolution and at a time when our independence was far from being assured, the report of the committee to the contrary notwithstanding. As early as 1780 Lord Howe wrote to his Government that fictitious paper had been circulated by the British to such an extent as to render worthless the Continental money. I will here quote briefly from an able article on metallic money by James D. Holden:

The paper currency issued during the Revolutionary war by the Continental Congress, also that issued by the Confederate States during the rebellion, both of which depreciated to such an extent that they became valueless, are frequently alluded to by advocates of the specie-basis system for the purpose of showing the superiority of metallic over paper money. Such references, although unjustly so, have proven a most effective weapon in the hands of those who are so greatly benefited by a continuance of the present financial policy of the Government. Unjustly so for the reason that there is no analogy whatever between full legal-tender paper money and the issues referred to. Neither of these issues were money nor did they purport to be. They were promises to pay gold coin made by a people impoverished in a struggle to establish that which alone possesses the sovereign power to create and issue money, a reasonable government.

Not long ago I saw a statement that the assessable value of the property of Massachusetts at the time of the Revolutionary war, when it included the State of Maine, was $11,000,000, and the entire assessed value of the thirteen colonies was about $600,000,000. In these days our country has increased its property value, from 1880 to 1890, twenty thousand millions, or two thousand millions a year net.

A comparison between a financial proposition of the weak, struggling colonists and that of our country to-day does not seem to me to be legitimate. But in the former case the Government did not loan its money and had no security, whereas in the plan now before us the Government loans its money and takes approved security for every legal dollar issued, while the bill-holder is protected by the legal-tender quality of the money, and should it depreciate in value it can be used to pay off the mortgage indebtedness, release the property, and be retired at par. Thus it is not possible for the Government or the individual to suffer loss.

As regards the more recent issue of paper money in this country I will again quote Mr. Holden, who says:

The authority for the issue of Confederate currency was simply an unsuccessful attempt to establish a government. As regards the Continental currency, in the light of the successful issue of the conflict, it may with safety be said that had the issue been full legal-tender paper money, instead of unnecessary and futile promises to pay gold coin, there would have been no depreciation in the issue whatever. That this view is not an unreasonable one is illustrated by the difference in value during the rebellion of the two different paper issues of the Federal Government, one of which, the "demand notes," issued to the amount of $60,000,000, remaining at par with coin during the darkest days of the struggle, notwithstanding the fact that the other issue, known as "greenbacks," depreciated in value as compared with coin or the demand notes. The demand notes remained at par because they performed all the legal functions of gold coin. The greenbacks depreciated in value because they did not.

It is claimed by specie-basis advocates that the depreciation of the greenbacks was due to an impaired credit of the Government. This, however, can not be true, for the reason that an impaired Government credit would have affected all its paper issues alike. The other claim that the demand notes remained at par, because they were "payable in coin on demand," is not tenable, for the reason that the Government suspended specie payment January 1, 1862, and did not resume until January 1, 1879.

In its report the committee, by its able chairman, expressed alarm lest a low rate of interest might inspire improvident habits. If this theory be true, then by all means let us raise the rates of interest all over the country, for we most certainly want our people to be as provident as it is possible to be. But perhaps the committee considers that we have reached that happy medium of supplying the borrower with money without inspiring him with improvident, extravagant, or speculative habits. The suggestion that a low rate of interest can be prejudicial to the borrower seems to me a most singular one, especially when we consider that money, except in its use, is of no more value than any other tool. I suspect that it would be difficult to convince the borrower that he could be injured by a low rate of interest. The greatest stimulus of production is the ability to make exchange of surplus products; without this ability the stimulus to industry would be lost, civilization would cease, and abject poverty would become the rule. The report further says:

The circulating value of a paper currency can only be maintained by its convertibility into specie at the will of the holder.

Here I take issue. The real value of money lies in its ability to pay debts, equalize balances, and facilitate the exchange of commodities, and that is the best money which will do this directly, and not by first converting it into another kind of money of an unequal quantity, and then using that money in the settlement of obligations.

The assertion of the committee in this case can not be explained, except by supposing that money depends for its value upon something besides its legal-tender quality. The great thinkers, from Aristotle to Mill, the committee excepted, all agree that money does not depend upon the material for its value, but upon its legal-tender qualities. Aristotle said:

Money exists not by nature, but by law.

In 1837 Henry Clay said in these halls:

Whatever the Government agrees to receive in payment of the public dues is money, no matter what its form may be; Treasury notes, drafts, etc. Such bills or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, are money.

Daniel Webster said:

When all our paper money is made payable in specie on demand, it will prove the most certain means that can be used to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow.

Benjamin Franklin said:

Gold and silver are not intrinsically of equal value with iron. No methods have been hitherto formed to establish a medium of trade equal in all its advantages to bills of credit made a legal tender.

The theory of the intrinsic value of money has been abandoned by the best writers and speakers.—Encyclopedia Britannica.

Metallic money, while acting as coin, is identical with paper money in respect to being destitute of intrinsic value.—North British Review.

An article is determined to be money by reason of the performance by it of certain functions, without regard to its form or substance.—Appleton's American Encyclopedia.

Falling prices and misery and destruction are inseparable companions. The disasters of the dark ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices. With the increase of money, labor and industry gain new life.—David Hume.

There is no more insignificant thing intrinsically in the economy of society than money.—John Stuart Mill.

That the intelligent and able members of this committee should take the position they do in regard to intrinsic values only shows how, without proper investigation, the ablest men may be deceived by popular fallacies.

The committee is also in error when it assumes that this bill can not be made available to any other class than the farmers. It is, on the contrary, intended for the benefit of all classes, but the farmer necessarily becomes the instrument by which the money is issued, because he possesses the best security upon which the Government can loan. The farmer will, in its use, put the money in circulation. In the abundance of money thus created the mechanic, the laborer, the merchant, and the manufacturer will obtain all they need for the transaction of their various callings.

That more money is necessary to carry on the business of the country is conceded, I believe, by every intelligent person; therefore to confine ourselves to coining gold and silver, materials limited in quantity, owned by a few individuals, and over which the Government has no control, is to fail to meet the nation's wants.

Our business is carried on mostly upon credit, and the only way to protect credit is to have a sufficiency of money, in order that when the demand for money is made it can be obtained, on good security. It has been stated, and I presume on good authority, that the shrinkage in values in this country by the disturbance of credit in consequence of the failure of the Barings was equal to $2,600,000,000, and as our business increases, the more necessary it becomes that we should have money enough for the protection of our credit. Just contemplate the magnitude of a business which in ten years has increased the wealth of the country nearly twenty thousand millions.

The value of property is in its force. To illustrate this I venture to quote from a speech I made in this Chamber in 1890, because it seems to perfect the argument to-day more than anything else that I could say:

The power of money is only to be measured by the extent to which it is used; to the extent of the credit given on property the value becomes energized, as illustrated in the case of the 90 per cent of currency advanced by the Government on its own bonds. One hundred thousand dollars in United States bonds are worth to the owner in his vault, and to the owner only, say, $4,000 per annum, the interest they bear, but when the owner receives the 90 per cent of the money in legal tender the latent force is energized and the $90,000 in its activity may create in a single year a value equal to the entire amount advanced. The same energy can be imparted to the latent value of land by a loan, as in the case of a loan upon bonds.

Money is only valuable in its activities, and to the extent that it is in activity there will be production and corresponding benefits to the laboring classes, who, after all, are the great multitude of our people, and as such they involve the greatest economic considerations. To illustrate how far the activities may determine the values, suppose a man borrows $100 for one year at 6 per cent and employs one hundred men to work for him at a dollar a day. With this sum of $100 he is able to employ them for one day. If he can convert the product of their labor into cash at the close of the day he can employ them the next day, and so on for every workday in the year. The $6 interest on the money in the presence of such activities becomes inconsequent.

When money is controlled by a few it gives that few an undue power and control over labor and the resources of the country. Labor will have its best return when the laborer can control its disposal; with an abundance of money, and through coöperation, this end will be practically attained.

Money, the indispensable tool in the transaction of business and the industries of the country generally, should not be allowed to pass into the hands of a few, for it commands the entire labor of the country. It stimulates labor and employs it, from the construction of the simplest implement up to the steam engine, where a man puts his hand to a lever and becomes equal in power to a thousand men. This power for good is only limited by the amount of labor it can command. Where it exists in sufficient quantities there can be no laborer unemployed excepting from choice.

It also provides the means by which labor can organize in the prosecution of every calling and assures to the laborer the full fruits of his industry.

To illustrate this, let us suppose that a mechanic in a coöperative association earns $3 a day. He leaves $1 in the association and takes $2 for the support of his family. The daily dollar left with the association is equal to the interest on a capital of $5,000 at 6 per cent, and ought, if there is money enough in the country, to command the credit necessary to prosecute the calling of the association. Therefore each man in the association is equal to a capital of $5,000.

With money so plentiful that it can not be monopolized, men can combine their productive capacities and command the money necessary to carry on their business to any extent.

Wealth is the product of labor, and is only valuable in its uses. Legislation has been and is still directed towards the protection of wealth, rather than towards the far more important interests of labor on which everything of value to mankind depends. This bill has for its ultimate aim the benefit and assistance to the great producing sources of all prosperity. When money is restricted in quantity, it necessarily gives to a few a control of production. Labor must not be denied its tools; on the contrary, it must be supplied with them, for its value depends upon its power of production, and by this power it will always be measured.

It does not seem to me that there can be any reasonable question of the power of the Government to issue paper money and loan it, when the fact is considered that it issues and loans its paper money now, and that such action has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Government now loans paper money upon its own indebtedness for the purpose of supplying, in part, the national want of a sound circulating medium. In order to supply this want the Government pays interest of 4 per cent upon its bonds, whereas the bill now under consideration would enable it to supply the same kind of money to the country, and instead of paying interest to receive 2 per cent. Consider for a moment the effect of making active and putting in circulation the latent forces that lie in one-half the real estate of the country.

The rate of 2 per cent will not be burdensome to the borrower. In time the entire expense of the Government may be met from this source, and as the money when loaned by the Government is to supply a general want, the loaning becomes a most beneficent act, while the burdens of Government will be entirely lifted from the people.

While the bill provides that the loan shall be for a period not longer than twenty years, yet the borrower has the privilege of paying off the indebtedness when he no longer has use for the money, and the Government at the expiration of the twenty years may renew the loan. If this bill should become law it would probably soon furnish the Government with money sufficient to meet all its ordinary expenses.

As for the details of the bill, I do not care to discuss them. I am willing that it shall be amended as the wisdom of the Senate determines. I think the objections in detail, as brought out by the report, are not justified, and at another time I shall be ready to discuss them if occasion offers. Now, I trust more particularly to the principle involved, which is the duty of the Government to furnish money enough to meet the wants of the people. This duty on the part of the Government is conceded; therefore, the question only remains how it can be accomplished; and for my part I do not see how else it can be done than by issuing money stamped on a material inexhaustible in supply, upon unimpeachable security.

The loaning of money on real estate need excite no alarm or be thought a new or strange thing. It is being done now by banks in every State in the Union. This bill merely suggests that the Government shall do directly what has so long been done indirectly; that it shall fulfill its obligations by furnishing the people at a low rate of interest with that which is indispensable to their prosperity and happiness—money, the best medium of exchange.

In conclusion, I have no hesitation in declaring that, for money purposes alone, the credit of our nation, with its legal power, is more valuable to us than would be inexhaustible mines of gold.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not read the bill lately, if I ever did, and I should like to ask the Senator whether there is any limit in the bill to the amount of money that may be loaned to any one person?

Mr. STANFORD. There is no limit, except the value of the security. The object is to get the money out to the people, and thus make use of it to the extent that the people have security to give for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the bill by its provisions include, on a fair interpretation, a corporation?

Mr. STANFORD. I think so, if the corporation had any lands to offer as security.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there anything in the bill that would prevent large corporations, say one of the large railroad companies, from making a demand for a large amount of money from the Government on the faith of its land grant, for instance? Could such companies do that?

Mr. STANFORD. No matter where the money comes from, so that it gets out among the people. The Government can not afford to part with its money except upon a full consideration. But unfortunately for the railroads, their lands are generally already mortgaged at 6 per cent.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not desire to embarrass my friend the Senator from California, but I should like to ask him whether it is proposed that these issues of money shall be made in more than one place in a State?

Mr. STANFORD. By the Government itself in all the States.

Mr. MORRILL. In the principal town or in all the towns?

Mr. STANFORD. By such agencies as the proper Department of the Government shall determine.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I should like to inquire, as the Senator talks about this bringing a large income to the United States, how much it would cost to establish agencies in every considerable town of our country to investigate the value of land, and also to certify that to the Government.

Mr. STANFORD. I do not think it follows necessarily that there shall be an agent in every county. There will be agents of the Government. I suppose, however, that it will probably cost less to make the investigation than the people now have to pay when they borrow money.

Mr. MORRILL. But in order to have the bill comprehensive and equal in its value, the farmers in every county and town in the United States ought to have the privilege of obtaining this money.

Mr. STANFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. Then there must be somebody to ascertain the value of the land upon which it is proposed to base this loan.

Mr. STANFORD. Yes. That is ascertained by the assessment on which the farmer pays his taxes, which is conclusive. It is not proposed that the Government shall loan money to a greater amount than one-half of that value, but that value may be rejected by the Government agents if it is not thought satisfactory by them.

Mr. MORRILL. The land must be examined by somebody in each particular locality, and, if so, it seems to me it would take considerable of an army to furnish the requisite information to the Government for it to act upon.

Mr. STANFORD. Not more, at any rate, than is now done in borrowing from private individuals, probably nothing like so much. When the plan is properly systematized, I suppose one agent will be sufficient to investigate for several counties. Perhaps the United States district attorney or some other officer may be selected.

I have not discussed the details of the bill because I have considered that the great question was to establish the principle. When that is established, then the details may be discussed and adopted as the wisdom of Congress shall determine. In presenting this bill I thought in order that it might be well understood that I should present what I supposed would fairly provide for the machinery to put the plan in operation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator wish to have made of the bill?

Mr. STANFORD. I understand the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] desires to be heard on the bill before it is referred.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, the details of this bill need not now be considered, and it would be equally useless at this time to discuss the particular plan by which its provisions are to be carried into effect. It is the principle of the bill which first concerns us, the doctrine it embodies, the proposition it involves. Until that is conceded it is folly to go further. The bill assumes that the people, through the agency of the Government which they have created, not only may or can, but that they ought to supply themselves with what money they need, and that borrowers ought to have the use of money at a low rate of interest. It is to that assumption that I desire to address myself.

When we look backward over the progress of this century and see how far we have come, it seems strange that we are just at the threshold of the greatest problem of all the centuries, the equitable distribution of the products of labor; that we are only beginning to learn the powers which justly belong to the government of a free people, and to see how admirably adapted to the demands of a high civilization our own Government is.

An intelligent discussion of this bill requires, at the outset, a consideration of some of the powers which were granted to the Federal Government, and the reasons therefor. The crucial period in our early history was that between the close of the Revolutionary war and the organization of government under the Constitution. The union of the colonies was a confederation entered into for purposes of mutual defense. They had not surrendered their sovereignty. They had not established a federal government. The people did not constitute a nation. They joined forces in a war in which they had a common interest, and at its close they found themselves politically independent, but still commercially prostrate before their old enemy, and a prey to the rapacity of maritime powers.

Six years of political confusion, six years of commercial slavery, six years of local conflicts among a people of common origin, of similar history, speaking the same language and worshiping the same God, wrought a new revolution; order came out of chaos, and in the travail of the time this nation was born. Its coming was as natural as the birth of a child. All things were ready, and the time had come. The people, having learned the weakness of division and the danger of delay, formed a more perfect Union by ordaining and establishing a Constitution and organizing a Government with plenary powers concerning all matters which had occasioned them most trouble in their divided condition, chief among which were taxation and commerce.

All legislative authority of the new Government was vested in a Congress, and in the enumeration of many powers granted, the first relates to laying and collecting taxes; the second, to borrowing money; the third, to regulating commerce; the fourth, to naturalization and bankruptcy; the fifth, to money and weights and measures. After expressly mentioning these and many others, the last grant of power is this:

> To make all laws which shall be necessary for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

The government of a monarchy is the machinery by which the imperial will is applied in the laws. The government of a republic is the agency through which the popular will is to be expressed and the people's judgment executed. In this country we have conferred upon the Government certain specific powers relating to matters which pertain to the general welfare; then we authorize Congress to provide the means necessary to make these powers effective in legislation.

When we speak of the Government, we do not refer to some great unknown or untried power, some foreign entity separate and apart from ourselves, our institutions and our country; nor do we allude to a paternal potentate, prince or power, endowed with fatherly instincts, whose watchful care directs our way and guards our interests. Paternalism is an exotic; it does not flourish in a Republic where the people are the source of power.

The Government of the United States was organized by the people not as a disconnected body to control their affairs and provide for their wants, but as a direct agency for the execution of great powers—to "establish justice, secure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare." It is a government clothed with the power of the people, established for their convenience and benefit. When we assert that the Government acts, it is equivalent to saying the people move. If the Government declare war, build a railroad, or create money, it but carries into effect what the people, in one form or other, had determined should be done. The Government is the child of the people, not their father.

The authority of Congress over the subject of money is absolute and without limit. It is expressly granted in two separate clauses of the Constitution—one relating to commerce among the several States, the other to the coining of money and regulating the value thereof. Either would be sufficient to confer all the power needed. Indeed, the power would exist without a grant; it belongs to a nation as an incident of sovereignty, the same as any other power necessary to perpetuate government and insure the comfort and convenience of the people. The authority has been voluntarily bestowed by those in rightful possession of it, and in language so plain as to be unmistakable.

This doctrine was taught by the fathers, though they differed about its proper application. One party urged it when favoring the United States bank policy; the other party, with equal assurance of its soundness, applied it to the theory of a Government supply of money, independent of banks. Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to John W. Epps, June 24, 1813, wrote:

> And so the nation may continue to issue its bills as far as its wants require and the limit of its circulation will admit.

Again, in another letter to the same person, September 11, 1813, he said:

> Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation to whom it belongs.

President Madison, in a message to Congress, December 3, 1816, said:

> But for the interest of the community at large, as well as for the purposes of the Treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit, and use wherever it may circulate. The Constitution has intrusted Congress exclusively with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description.

Daniel Webster, in an argument delivered in the Senate, January 31, 1833, said:

> The constitutional power vested in Congress over the legal currency of the country is one of its very highest powers, and the exercise of this high power is one of the strongest bonds of the union of the States. * * * It is not to be doubted that the Constitution intended that Congress should exercise a regulating power, a power both necessary and salutary, over that which should constitute the actual money of the country, whether that money were coin or the representative of coin. So it has always been considered.

This matter has been judicially determined several times. The Supreme Court, in the "Legal-tender" cases, 12 Wallace, United States Supreme Court Reports, 545 et seq., say:

> The Constitution was intended to frame a government as distinguished from a league or compact, a government supreme in some things over States and people. It was designed to provide the same currency having a uniform legal value in all the States. It was for this reason the power to coin money and regulate its value was conferred upon the Federal Government, while the same power to emit bills of credit was withheld from the States. The States can no longer declare what shall be money or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress it is annihilated. * * *
> And, generally, when one of such powers was expressly denied to the States only, it was for the purpose of rendering the Federal power more complete and exclusive; how sensible, then, its framers must have been that emergencies might arise where the precious metals might prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government and the demands of the people—when it is remembered that paper money was almost exclusively in use in the States as a medium of exchange, and when the great evil sought to be remedied was the want of uniformity in the current value of money; it might be argued, we say, that the gift of power to coin money and regulate the value thereof was understood as conveying general power over the currency, and which had belonged to the States and which they had surrendered. * * *
> By the obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law shall recognize as money when the payment is to be made. If there is anything settled by decision it is this, and we do not understand it to be controverted. No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000, contracted before 1834, could be paid with 100 eagles coined after that year, though they contained no more gold than 94 eagles when the contract was made, and this is not because of the intrinsic value of the coin, but because of its legal value. The eagles coined after 1834 were not money until they were authorized by law, and had they been coined before, without a law fixing their legal value, they could no more have paid a debt than uncoined bullion or cotton or wheat.

As to the express grant there can be no dispute, but there is some difference of opinion concerning the nature, scope, and extent of the implied powers. We are pretty well agreed upon what commerce means, and there is no disposition to question the right of Congress to exercise supervisory powers over it in a general way; but where is the limit of jurisdiction and what may be justly excluded from Congressional oversight? Commerce is defined to be "the exchange or buying and selling of commodities; especially the exchange of merchandise on a large scale between different places or communities; extended trade or traffic."

The internal commerce of the United States is enormous, twenty times greater than our foreign trade; greater than the entire foreign commerce of all the great nations of Europe. The Pennsylvania Railroad system alone, according to Mr. Carnegie, transports more tonnage than all the merchant ships of Britain. In carrying on this immense trade nearly one-half the railway mileage of the world is used, half a million men are employed, and a vast number of locomotives, cars, boats, ships, and other vehicles and implements are in constant use. Every one of these items is subject to Congressional control if it be used in interstate commerce. Congress exercises control over navigable waters, and the boats floated on them, and we have gone so far along the line of interstate-railway traffic as to bring it all under one general rule, prohibiting unjust discriminations and unreasonable charges.

We are exercising similar control over money, and it is because money, like cars and ships, is an instrument of commerce. In the march of civilization we have come to a plane where vehicles for moving values are as needful as vehicles for moving commodities. Our bank exchanges in a single year amount to over $18,000,000,000. Dimes, dollars, and eagles are as much instruments of commerce as are cars, locomotives, and steamboats. The power to regulate one includes the power to regulate all. And we are not without authority and precedent in this matter. Economists and statesmen agree that money is a necessary factor in commercial transactions, and our Government has many times exercised authority over the use of money, not only in the mints and in the Treasury, but in the hands of the people.

During sixty-nine years of our national life the Government fixed the rate of interest which citizens should pay for the use of money. Under the two acts establishing United States banks (in force forty years) the rate of interest was fixed at 6 per cent. The rate prescribed in the present national banking law is the legal rate in States where the banks are situated and 7 per cent where there is no legal rate fixed by the State law. In addition to this, the statute prescribes the kind of security which may be taken—personal security.

It is submitted, Mr. President, that in the light of our own history, it is rather late to question either the authority or the propriety of the people preparing and issuing money for their own use when they need it. Every one of the American colonies, at times when they were without gold or silver coin, prepared, issued, and used paper money. The seven years' war of the Revolution was fought to successful conclusion on paper money; and our new Government began the issue of paper before it was three years old. Bank notes were issued in 1791, and Treasury notes followed quickly after the first bank charter expired in 1811. Treasury notes were issued in 1812, 1813, 1814, and 1815.

The second United States bank was established in 1816, continuing twenty years, to 1836. Treasury notes were issued in 1837, 1838, 1840, 1841, 1842 (two issues), 1843, 1846, 1847, 1857, 1860, and 1861.

Besides these issues of notes under authority of acts of Congress, local banks in all parts of the country were issuing notes under State laws. And all this in order to satisfy the public need of money. When the slaveholders' rebellion brought war upon us in 1861, coin ceased to circulate among the people, the national Treasury was empty, banks suspended specie payments, and the most perplexing question before Congress was how to procure money with which to prosecute the war. The defects and inconveniences of bank notes issued under authority of State laws became painfully apparent, and the financiers of that day set about to devise a "national currency."

Early in 1863 the scheme took form in an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a national currency." In the mean time several acts had been passed authorizing the issue of Treasury notes and United States notes to a large amount, some of them being declared "lawful money," and were made legal tender in payment of all debts except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt. During the four years of that war Government paper issued under various acts of Congress, and which was used and reported as currency or as money, was $3,309,271,327.45, as appears from the following table, found on page 60 of the report of the Treasurer of the United States, 1891:

United States currency of each class, together with one and two year notes and compound-interest notes, issued, redeemed, and outstanding at the close of the fiscal year 1891.

The amount outstanding at the beginning of the fiscal year 1866, exactly stated in the finance report for that year at pages 25, 104, and 168, was $1,942,842,630. And this does not include national-bank notes. When that money was issued it was not expected by the Government officers that it would be kept and used as a permanent currency. It was believed that national-bank notes would takes its place. Within four years after the war closed there was but little of it left in circulation except that part of it technically designated "United States notes," commonly known as "greenbacks." The retirement of this particular class of paper was suspended by act of Congress in the early part of 1868 (February 4), and it served the purposes of a "national currency" so admirably that by the act of Congress of May 31, 1878, it was made part of the permanent money of the country, and the Supreme Court held the money good.

Thus it appears that from the beginning we have been accustomed to the use of paper money, and in every instance when coin was so scarce as to imperil the public credit or greatly inconvenience the people Congress provided Treasury notes for temporary use. Our experience during the great war and since has taught us that, under some circumstances at least, we may use paper money safely; and it is now quite generally conceded that whatever of that sort of money we do use ought to be prepared and issued by the General Government so that it shall form a national circulating medium, having equal value in all parts of the country.

There are some very large bodies of organized farmers in this country and workingmen in other departments of industry who have been for some years considering this matter of paper money, and without exception they have expressed themselves in favor of Government issues. They are all opposed to corporations of any class controlling any portion of the circulating medium of the country. The Knights of Labor, the Patrons of Husbandry, the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association, and other similar organizations have expressed themselves as being strongly opposed to any other sort of paper money than that issued directly by the Government.

It is needless to refer to the records of these bodies; they are public, open to the world, so that all who wish to obtain them have done so or may do so. It may be well, however, to place on record here a more authoritative statement than this. At the twenty-third session (1889) of the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, a committee was appointed to present to Congress the various measures which, in the opinion of the body, required legislative action. On request of the committee Mr. Mortimer Whitehead, national lecturer of the Grange, prepared a brief review of the proceedings had in the national councils of the order on the subject of finance. It is as follows. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY, NATIONAL GRANGE,
OFFICE OF LECTURER,
Washington, D. C., December 29, 1890.

DEAR SIR: Complying with the request of your committee, I submit herewith a brief report of the action of the National Grange for several years past, relating to finance, as found recorded in the proceedings of its annual meetings.

The National Grange is on record through all the years of its history in favor of a plentiful supply of money for the use of all the people of our country, and against the control of money by a few special classes who have it in their power to depress the price of land and all its products, and the products of other labor as well.

However much farmers, in their several organizations, and laboring men in theirs, may differ upon other matters it is a good sign that, without exception, all the farmers, laborers, and workingmen's societies in the United States have placed the demand for the free coinage of silver in their national platforms, and have recorded themselves squarely on the side of more money and no middlemen to control its supply. All agree that at least $50 per capita should be the limit, and that the supply of currency should increase in proportion to the increase in population.

The plan of the Government issuing money at a low rate of interest upon landed security direct to the people, the same as it is now loaned to the national banks with their bonds for security, has rapidly grown in favor, and has been approved by the National Grange after full, fair, and free discussion.

Respectfully,

MORTIMER WHITEHEAD,
Lecturer, National Grange, P. of H.

JOHN TRIMBLE,
Member of Legislative Committee of the National Grange, P. of H.

Mr. PEFFER. Thirty-four States and Territories were represented by delegates in the body that appointed the committee to whom that statement was made, and the membership of the Grange at that time was about 500,000. It is the oldest body of organized farmers in the country and controls half a million votes on money.

And further showing the feeling among farmers and their colaborers throughout the country concerning Government control of the currency, I will ask the Secretary to read the paper which the page will carry to his desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 6, 1892.

To the honorable the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, a committee elected by the supreme council of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, under its instructions and on its behalf, would most respectfully represent:

That the universal and unparalleled depression in all departments of our great agricultural industry has impressed the farmers of the United States with gravest concern and alarm. That despite their fruitful soils, the favoring conditions of climate, their faithful application and courageous industry, and irrespective of seasons or harvests, their farms and the products of their labor are constantly and steadily depreciating in value. That the inspiriting hope of competency and comfort as a reward for their toil is vanishing in their earnest struggle for sustenance and the preservation of home. That patient, honest, and earnest investigation of this anomalous condition of affairs has impressed the farmers of the country with the solemn conviction that the evils which are thus clogging and paralyzing their energies are largely due to discriminating inequalities in our governmental policy and which are the legitimate outgrowth of partial and unfriendly legislation.

Your memorialists would further respectfully represent:

That in their organized capacity, the farmers in thirty-eight States and Territories of the Union, after long and earnest deliberation and with remarkable unanimity, formulated and adopted a declaration of principles (an official copy of which is hereto appended), which they believe if enacted into law would restore agriculture to its true and just position among the great industries of the country and would conserve the highest and best interests of the public good. That they respectfully, but most earnestly, commend to the patriotic consideration and favor of your honorable bodies the justice and wisdom of enacting such laws as will embody the principles enunciated in the declaration referred to.

Your memoralists would respectfully represent:

That they are specially charged to ask the attention of your honorable bodies to the great and urgent necessity for immediate legislative action for the financial relief of the industrial and business interests of the country. That they believe that the present financial system of the country is not only inherently defective but that it is incompatible with the genius and spirit of our institutions and is in conflict with the fundamental principles of our Government. That they believe that the system, born of the terrible exigencies of a mighty civil war, purely as a military expedient and necessity, which, while it doubtless saved the life of the nation in war, has been demonstrated, under the test of experience, not to be the system for preserving and perpetuating that life in peace. That they believe that a sacred and steadfast observance and maintenance of the powers and functions conferred upon the Government by the Constitution, for making, issuing, and controlling the money of the people, is absolutely essential to healthful and symmetrical development in our material progress, and that these powers and functions can not in any manner be relinquished or transferred without violence to equity and justice and gravest peril to the safety and liberties of the people. That they believe that the exclusive rights secured to the Government by the Constitution to make money carries with it the unavoidable obligation and responsibility to supply it in such manner and amount as to meet at all times the requirements of the legitimate business of the country and of our growing population and trade. That they believe that the exercise of the legitimate and rightful functions of the Government in the control of money would obviate a recurrence of the ruinous effects of undue contraction in the volume, as demonstrated in the present depressed conditions, which are paralyzing the energies of the people in all departments of industrial enterprise. That they believe that all money should be issued direct by the Government to the people at a low rate of interest and in sufficient volume to meet the legitimate demands of the legitimate business of the country on safe and valid securities, and that it should be a full legal tender for all debts. That they believe that silver should have all the rights in coinage and all the qualities of legal tender which gold possesses.

Your memorialists would further respectfully represent:

That those for whom they speak do not ask your honorable bodies to venture upon doubtful expedient or experiment, but respectfully and most earnestly present the deplorable and alarming financial condition of the agricultural interests of the country, with the hope that a remedy may be speedily sought and devised through which they may be relieved from impending bankruptcy and ruin, and which will secure to our people and to posterity the blessings of a permanent, just, and equitable financial system.

Respectfully submitted.

C. W. MACUNE,
MANN PAGE,
W. F. GWYNNE,
L. P. FEATHERSTONE.

National Legislative Committee of the N. F. A. and I. U.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES OF THE NATIONAL FARMERS' ALLIANCE AND INDUSTRIAL UNION.

1. (a) We demand the abolition of national banks.

(b) We demand that the Government shall establish subtreasuries in the several States which shall issue money direct to the people at a low rate of tax, not to exceed 2 per cent per annum, on nonperishable farm products, and also upon real estate, with proper limitations upon the quantity of land and amount of money.

(c) We demand that the amount of the circulating medium be speedily increased to not less than $50 per capita.

2. We demand that Congress shall pass such laws as will effectually prevent the dealing in futures of all agricultural and mechanical productions, providing a stringent system of procedure in trials that will secure prompt conviction, and imposing such penalties as shall secure the most perfect compliance with the law

3. We condemn the silver bill recently passed by Congress, and demand in lieu thereof the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

4. We demand the passage of laws prohibiting alien ownership of land, and that Congress take prompt action to devise some plan to obtain all lands now owned by foreign syndicates, and that all lands now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of such as is actually used and needed by them be reclaimed by the Government, and held for actual settlers only.

5. Believing in the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, we demand—

(a) That our national legislation shall be so framed in the future as not to build up one industry at the expense of another.

(b) We further demand a removal of the existing heavy tariff tax from the necessities of life, that the poor of our land must have.

(c) We further demand a just and equitable system of graduated tax on incomes.

(d) We believe that the money of the country should be kept as much as possible in the hands of the people, and hence we demand that all national and State revenues shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the Government economically and honestly administered.

6. We demand the most rigid, honest, and just State and national governmental control and supervision of the means of public communication and transportation, and if this control and supervision does not remove the abuses now existing, we demand the Government ownership of such means of communication and transportation.

7. We demand that the Congress of the United States submit an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people of each State.

Mr. PEFFER. That memorial comes from men of the highest character, officially representing a body composed of farmers and other classes of working people, with a voting strength of at least two and a half million persons of every shade of political faith on other questions, but agreed on these: (1) That to the Government alone belongs the right to prepare and issue the people's money; (2) that Government paper ought to take the place of bank notes in the currency of the country; (3) that the only proper and safe test concerning the amount of money needed by the people is their own reasonable estimate based on their personal experience; (4) that the control of the financial interests of the people ought to be placed and kept in their own hands and wholly taken away from particular persons and corporations; (5) that the rate of interest for the use of money on long time ought to be the same in all parts of the country, and that it ought not to exceed the average rate of net profit of business in the industrial pursuits as shown in the annual rate of increase in the value of the permanent wealth of the country.

If it be objected that the plan proposed by this bill would open the way for dangerous inflation of the currency, it may be answered that it is no more subject to this objection than the national-bank law now and for a long time in force. The present bank capital, as the Comptroller's report shows, would carry a circulation of about $650,000,000, or more than $500,000,000 more than is now out. The banks could, if they choose to do so, increase their circulation to an unlimited extent. By act of Congress, January 24, 1875, the limit on bank circulation was removed, so that from that time to the present the banks have had the legal right to increase their circulation to any extent. There is nothing in this bill more dangerous than that.

In fact, sir, there is practically no limit now to the inflation of money under the existing system. Every bank check represents money; every draft, every bill of exchange, every promissory note in bank, represent money. Every mortgage on real estate and every chattel mortgage represent money. The only limit to the amount of money in use to-day, in one form or other, is the limit of the borrower's security. What a vast amount of money would be saved to the people if, as is proposed in this bill, the rate of interest were 2 per cent.

Concerning the probable depreciation of paper money, it may be said that whatever may have been the extent of depreciation in paper money in other countries, or what may have been the history of paper-money experiments in this country, it will hardly be affirmed by well-informed persons that United States notes issued during the war of the rebellion were treated fairly; that their apparent fluctuation in the money market came from an inherent defect in the money itself, or that in their case there was a fair and honest test of the merits of that sort of money. Senators now present remember that these notes were purposely depreciated by direct legislation in order that they might be used to advantage in the purchase of bonds. But there was another reason for their depreciation and for their seemingly frequent changes of value. I read from pages 22 and 23 of Finance Report, 1864:

> The experience of the few past months can not have failed to convince the most careless observer that, whatever may be the effect of a redundant circulation upon the price of coin, other causes have exercised a greater and more deleterious influence. In the course of a few days the price of this article rose from about $1.50 to $2.85 in paper for $1 in specie, and subsequently fell in as short a period to $1.87, and then again rose as rapidly to $2.50; and all without any assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease in the circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit, or other similar influence on the market, tending to occasion a fluctuation so violent. It is quite apparent that the solution of the problem may be found in the unpatriotic and criminal efforts of speculators, and probably of secret enemies, to raise the price of coin, regardless of the injury inflicted upon the country or desiring to inflict it.
> All such attempts should be indignantly frowned upon by a patriotic community, and the efforts of all good citizens invoked to counteract such nefarious schemes. A law providing for the exemplary punishment of combinations for such a purpose might tend to vindicate, if it could not fully protect, the public rights in this regard, and should be, so far as possible, rigidly enforced.
> But whatever success might attend any effort to check speculation in coin, or to counteract its injurious effect, it is still obvious that, so long as there remains a large and increasing necessity for its use, and a limited supply, it will command a price commensurate with the necessity and the difficulty of obtaining it.

It was this speculating in gold which affected its value in the market, and the money of the people was charged with the gambler's crime. It is not true, Mr. President, that our paper money depreciated, except in its relation to gold coin. It remained at par with other things from the hour of its issue. The business of the country was done on a paper basis; gold and gold coin were commodities, dealt in the same as stock and bonds. They were not money in the sense that Government notes were money. There was no gold money in circulation among the people. Paper money was used to pay the soldiers, to pay contractors, to pay everybody in the ordinary trade of the country. Paper was used in the purchase of bonds. Duties on imports and interest on the public debt were paid in coin, but nothing else was.

I repeat, sir, our paper money did not depreciate. Gold went up and down as the state of the gold market was made to be, and as the demand for it was greater or less the price was higher or lower. Compared with gold, everything went down, paper money with the rest. But, compared with wheat or corn, or cotton, tobacco, beef, pork, or any of the products of labor, or with labor itself, the paper money remained at par. This suggestion may be helpful to persons who worry over the loss of "parity" between gold and silver. If we will keep our money at par with the things which are necessary for the lives and comfort of the people, it will matter little about the money-changers' quarrel over the phantom "parity."

But why should such notes depreciate? Our bonds did not go down, and the same power which issued them and kept them good would issue the notes proposed by this bill. At one time we had bonds outstanding to the amount of $2,116,568,920. Our population at that time was about 38,000,000; our taxable wealth was about $32,000,000,000, and the bonds, instead of depreciating, went up in the market until they commanded a premium of 30 per cent and upwards. We have actually paid out $56,268,649.78 in premiums on our bonds the last four years. So good did we expect our bonds to be that before we had issued one we had planned a system of banking on them; and so good did they actually become that the banks withdrew most of their bonds deposited as security to bill holders and sold them in order to take advantage of the premium. If our bonds be good, why should our notes be bad? Our wealth is constantly increasing; so is our population and business. If we were able to keep our bonds at or above par it is difficult to understand why we could not manage to do as well by our notes.

The simple truth is, Mr. President, the people are becoming accustomed to regard the Government as not only the source, but the proper source, from which should issue all of our money, whether metallic or paper. Mr. Treasurer Huston, some two years ago, in his report called attention to the fact that the Government has assumed the responsibility of issuing money to the people of the country, and he devoted one full page to the importance of that particular subject. It has become common in the messages of our Presidents, and in all of our state papers relating to finance, that this subject is treated to greater or less extent.

It is not a new thing that is brought to the attention of the public now for the first time by a few men, here one and there one, anxious to court notoriety or to foist themselves into place to be stared at by the people. So strong and enduring has become our faith in the honor and credit of the people that we have practically abandoned the coinage of one of the metals used by us nearly a hundred years for coin, and now purchase it only to warehouse it and hold it there as security for issues of paper money.

There is nothing new, then, in the bill presented by the Senator from California so far as the matter of issuing paper money is concerned; but there are two other features of the bill which in this connection will appear to be new, or at least they will meet with opposition as if they were new, namely, first, to issue at one time a very large addition to the money of the country, and, second, to lend money to the people.

As to the first feature, the opposition comes from a small minority of our citizens; a minority which, however, wields an imperial influence in our public affairs, growing stronger and more powerful as its wealth is increased. Its rule of action is: "Ask and ye shall receive; knock and it shall be opened unto you." Its record is written in the statutes of our country. It managed to effect the retirement of more than a thousand million dollars of paper money at a time when one-third of our countrymen needed money more than they needed anything else; it made hard bargains for the people, and in their name and without their consent promised to pay large amounts of coin when we had no coin; it depreciated the value of the people's property, drove them into debt, and increased their obligations. In carrying out the policy of this minority the country was deprived of the use of more than $325,000,000 of silver money to which it was entitled.

The silver-coinage law of 1878 authorized the purchase and coinage of $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion every month, but the Treasury stopped at one-half that amount. Instead of purchasing and coining $4,000,000 worth the actual average coined was only $2,000,060 worth. Under the same policy, beginning in 1883, the banks, while increasing their number at the rate of one hundred and fifty-nine a year, down to 1890, withdrew their notes from circulation at the rate of about $22,000,000 a year, as appears from the Treasurer's report for 1891. From 1879 to 1882, four years, the annual increase of bank-note circulation was about $9,500,000. If that rate of increase had been continued down to 1890 we should have had about $250,000,000 of bank notes in circulation at that time more than we did have.

On the 30th day of June, 1882, the amount of bank notes out was $357,555,266, as appears from a recent statement; on the 30th day of June, 1890, the amount was $185,722,978, showing a retirement in the eight years of $171,832,288. (This is subject to an addition of the difference between the amounts of lawful money on deposit in the Treasury on the two days named to redeem the notes then in process of retirement.) Putting together the $325,000,000 of silver money of which we were deprived, and the $250,000,000 of bank notes withheld and withdrawn, we have a total of $575,000,000, money which would now be in circulation—that much more than we have.

It is within reason to believe that if this amount had been put out and kept out among the people, as the law authorized, as the lawmakers intended and expected, and as the business needs of the country required, there would now be but little indebtedness among the people. Here we have $575,000,000 which the laws provided for, but which was withheld in part and withdrawn in part, and the bill now before the Senate proposes to issue less than one-fifth of that amount. Besides this the banks were authorized to increase their circulation to an unlimited extent. Surely this, then, is not a reckless proposition, in view of what we have lost, and in view of the further fact that the minds of statesmen are now largely occupied by thoughts concerning the best way to safely add to the volume of our money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Chair will ask the Senator from Kansas to suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the pending order be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be read, and the Chair will state the question.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I renew the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that unanimous consent be given that the Senator from Kansas may conclude his speech before the regular order is taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Kansas concludes his remarks.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the request is granted. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, why increase the circulating medium? Let the census reports answer. The private indebtedness of the people is increasing at an alarming rate. Tables for five States—Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Tennessee are now in type, and I am under obligations to Mr. Superintendent Porter and Mr. Holmes, an able assistant, for advance proofs. They show an incumbrance on the farms and homes of the people in force January 1, 1890, equal to an average of $85 for every person, man, woman, and child, in the five States. The average for Alabama and Tennessee is $24; for Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas, it is $125. This was nearly all placed during the last preceding ten years. In ten counties in the heart of one of the best of the Western States, 64 per cent of the farms which are occupied by their owners are encumbered.

The average value of the farms is $3,694, and the average mortgage debt is $1,402. It costs the owner of a mortgaged farm, which he cultivates in these ten counties, $114 annually to carry his mortgages. Though reports are incomplete, enough is known to show that farmers and poor townspeople in the Eastern and Middle States are no better off than those of the Western and Southern States. And yet it appears that Massachusetts, with 8,315 square miles of territory, with a population of 2,230,000, and a taxable property valuation of $1,584,756,802 in 1880, increased her taxable wealth in the ten years following $569,377,824, while nine great agricultural States—Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana—with a territory of 485,385 square miles, a population of 15,600,000, and taxable property amounting to $2,792,919,163 in 1880, increased their taxable wealth only $559,000,000, or $10,000,000 in round numbers less than Massachusetts. Their territorial area is fifty-eight times that of Massachusetts, their population in 1880 was seven times as large as hers, and their wealth was nearly twice as great.

The increase in the assessed property valuation in that small State during the ten years was two and one-fourth times as much as that of Missouri; two and one-half times as much as Ohio; three and one-half times as much as each of the two States Kentucky and Wisconsin; four times as much as each of the two States Georgia and Tennessee; four and one-half times as much as Kansas; five times as much as each of the four States Colorado, Indiana, New Jersey, and Oregon; six times as much as each of the two States Arkansas and Nebraska; seven times as much as each of the three States Alabama, Iowa, and Louisiana; ten times as much as each of the States North Carolina and Virginia, and twelve times as much as each of the States Florida and Mississippi.

The three States of Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts, with a territorial area of 102,700 square miles, with a population of 11,048,847, and with an assessed property valuation of $5,920,155,824 in 1880, increased their aggregate taxable wealth in the ten years following $2,602,145,772, or $229,920,528 more than one-half as much as all the rest of the country put together. Here is a tabulated statement showing these facts in detail:

a Annual report of 1889.
b The State board of equalization declares that in 1880 the assessed value was 50 per cent and in 1890 only 25 per cent of the true value; hence the reduction.

This is an astounding state of facts. Here we have a small portion of the country, three States, with an area but little larger than that of Kansas and not two-fifths as large as Texas, with one-sixth the population of the country and one-third the taxable wealth, accumulating more property in the same time than one-half of all the rest of the country. And this includes but a very small amount of money, though the money centers are there.

These are manufacturing States, they are commercial States, and some of their people are largely engaged in the business of lending money. They have been blessed by the fostering care and protecting hand of a friendly Government, and they have reaped golden harvests from fields which the farmers planted. Year by year these States grow richer as compared with other parts of the country, and with their greater wealth comes a larger influence and increased power in public affairs. There is the manufacturing center, there the money center, there the political center of the American people, and there are our present rulers.

Mr. President, we are face to face with a grave problem. They who control the money of the people regulate their business and dictate their laws. Wall street claims to wield a power greater than that of monarchies, and we know that the Government of the United States is on friendly terms with Wall street. We know, further, that our Government has poured millions of money into the laps of operators there. And we know, further, that many millions of money not due have been paid to public creditors—a mere gratuity to a favored few, and at times, too, when the toiling masses were clamoring for money to use in their daily business. In the single year 1890, as appears in the Treasury Department report, some $17,000,000 in premium on bonds and $12,000,000 in advance interest were paid out of the public Treasury—not one dollar of it due. The amount paid as premium would never have been due and need never have been paid, and the amount paid as advance interest would not have been due till nine months after the money was actually paid. We are pressing money on men who do not need it, while many of the men who imperiled their lives when the country was in danger are forced into almshouses to escape starvation.

A few persons, comparatively, are fast absorbing the wealth of the country. The average annual rate of wealth-increase was 4 per cent the last ten years, while borrowers were compelled to pay 8 to 12 per cent and upward for the use of borrowed money. Operators about the money centers grow opulent and strong, while men and women whose labor produces the wealth grow correspondingly poor and weak. All this is wrong, and it betokens an unhealthy state of things. The system which begets it is fatally defective. It must be modified if not radically changed, in the common interest of all the people. Money is the life-blood of commerce. It flows out through the arteries of trade, carrying health and vigor to every department of business. It stimulates effort, it encourages enterprise, it civilizes men, and brings the world together. It employs labor and lightens the burden of toil. It drives away want and relieves distress. It gladdens the hearts of the poor, it takes joy to the lowly, it brings hope to the despondent, and throws sunshine into the dwellings of men.

To him who lives in affluence and ease, whose home nestles in the splendors of wealth, who moves amid magnificent surroundings, to him it matters little what is the state of the money market. He has credit, which takes the place of money. His check is good at bank for a thousand or a million dollars. Scarcity of money affects him not; his income is fixed; he draws steadily upon the labor of other men. He knows not what it is to want. It it is not so with the man of toil—the man who opens farms, lays out highways, bridges streams, tunnels mountains, and builds cities—the man whose muscles rear the mansions of the rich, and whose sweat and blood lay crystallized in palatial walls. Money enters into the daily business of the common people; they can not get along without it, its need being most keenly felt where the greatest poverty is. Time was, and that, too, within the memory of many of us now living, when but little money was needed in the ordinary affairs of working people.

The mechanic owned his little shop, worked up crude material, and received pay largely in supplies fresh from the field, orchard, or garden. The farm hand dwelt in the tenant house, and he had his garden, his firewood and cow pasture free, but the country mechanic who once dwelt among the farmers is there no more; he has become a character in history. He has been driven into towns and cities and there massed among machines wth muscles of iron and nerves of steel. Whereas once he did all the work that was done on the articles which he made, and received all the profits, now he works on a particular part only, and his employer takes the profit on the finished article. And whereas once he received his pay largely in barter, now he can use nothing but money in the many little transactions which the wants of his family make necessary.

Look at him, with a hundred, five hundred, or a thousand others, moving in line by the window or the counter on pay day, waiting his turn for the $1.25, more or less, per day which may be due him on his week's or his month's work. The employer does not wait for his money. He passes the long line of waiting workers and draws his check for the money he needs, if any. It is a pregnant fact, sir, that of all men, he that is poor, in this day and age, is most in need of money. His daily wage may be $1 or $2, or less or more, but he needs it all, every cent of it, in money. Nothing else satisfies his need. He trades within a small circle, a dollar at a time, it may be, or a dime, even a penny, and he needs money in every transaction. When he made shoes, he had shoes to exchange for supplies; when he made wagons, he had wagons to trade; but now his employer has the shoes and the wagons, and he sells them in vast numbers, doing the business through banks. The poor man has no bank account. He transacts no business there. It is not an unreasonable estimate to place the number of persons in this country who work for wages at 12,000,000. Allowing each one of them $300 a year, the amount of money handled by them all would be $3,600,000,000—more than twice as much money as there is in the country.

Men of large means, men whose business affairs are managed on a large scale, need but little money. Our foreign commerce amounts to nearly $20,000,000,000 annually, and a few millions only are needed to settle balances. All the rest is done with drafts and bills of exchange. Our internal commerce is vast in extent, amounting yearly to many thousand million dollars, yet but little money comparatively is actually handled in doing the work, and most of that is needed to pay the poor men and women whose hands perform the hardest part of the labor. The farmer once made most of the implements he used in raising his crops. The fiber in his clothing was grown on the farm, the yarn was spun there, it was woven and made into garments within a few rods of the spot where it grew. Wheat and corn and cotton and tobacco were hauled miles away to the great market towns, and there exchanged for sugar, coffee, tea, spices, and other supplies which could not be produced at home. Meat was cured, fruit preserved, and grain ground on the land where they grew; but the smokehouse and the neighborhood mill, like the wagon-shop by the wayside, have disappeared. The modern farmer sells his wheat and buys his flour; sells his cattle and swine and buys his meat; he sells his fruit and buys it back in cans and jars; he sells his cotton and wool and buys them back in cloth and clothing.

All this requires money, and a great deal of it. Only fifty years ago a few dollars sufficed to carry on an ordinary farm a year; now it requires ten times as much. Wheat and cotton will not pay for wagons and shoes and coats now. Money and only money will answer.

And now, after having superseded the farmer as a mechanic and manufacturer on his own ground, having crowded him out of the business of making forks, leather, and cloth, and having pushed him from barter to cash, having wrested from him many of his ancient privileges and changed his habits of economy and self-help, having removed his defenses and exposed his interests to the organized rapacity of stronger men, his competitors have diminished the sources of his income and thus increased the number of his necessities. At a time when he needs $10 they give him but one. When the aggregate business of the country nets but 4 per cent yearly profit he is compelled to pay 8 per cent to 10 per cent, and far beyond in some instances, for the use of borrowed money. Shadows flit over his fields, his bushels and pounds do not go as far as they did once; he has more trouble to pay his taxes, and his interest dues seem larger and harder to meet than ever before.

The good year 1891 comes with its wonderful crops, foreign demand is greater than it has ever been, and prices of a few farm products go up; yet farming as a business is profitless; more than one-third of our farms are occupied by renters, and more than one-half of those that are occupied by owners are mortgaged for more than 50 per cent. of their value as estimated when times were good. Still, money flows steadily on to the great centers. More than $200,000,000 of interest and dividends goes to New York City every year. The great cities drain the country, while business failures increase steadily in number, and tenement houses and farm and home mortgages multiply. Under shadows from the smokestacks of manufacturing cities, rich farming lands lie idle. The wealth of the States grows grandly, but it accumulates only in the cities.

Like the moving waters of a mighty river, money pours steadily into the great centers where men deal in margins and gather in the drift of trade. The progress of these powerful communities is marked by the wrecks of commerce. One man is rich, nine are well-to-do, ninety others of every hundred are poor. A hundred years ago 95 per cent of our people lived on farms, and nearly as high a percentage owned their homes. Now, farmers and their assistants constitute about 45 per cent of the population; fully 60 per cent of the able-bodied people work for wages, and less than one-third of these own the houses they live in.

So we see, Mr. President, that money is a vital organ in the body of trade. Its circulation is a necessary function. To stop it, or to retard it, is to invite death and insure decay.

To take away the people's money from them is like draining away blood from the human body; and shortening the supply of money affects business just like withholding food affects the lives of men. They of fixed incomes, and they who live on interest which other men pay for the use of borrowed money, profit by the straits of debtors. Scarcity of money brings trouble on the farm and distress in the shop, but it pours dollars into the coffers of them that fatten on the misfortunes of their fellows. The Stanford bill proposes a remedy for this condition of things.

It is not my purpose at this time to discuss the philosophy of money nor to refer to the charge of "fiatism" further than to show that the money proposed in this bill is as good as the money we now use. I quote two sections of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be printed, signed, and ready for issue, for the purpose hereinafter mentioned, circulating notes of the United States of the denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000 to the amount of $100,000,000, and such additional amounts from time to time as shall be necessary to meet the requirements of this act.

SEC. 5. That said notes when issued, as hereinafter directed, shall be a legal tender in payment of private debts, equally with gold and silver coin for like amounts, and shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States, and also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States, within the United States, except interest on the public debt, and in redemption of the national currency.

If the notes provided in these sections are fiat money, then we have been using fiat money and with great success nearly thirty years. The first act of Congress making lawful money out of United States notes was approved February 25, 1862. The language of the law is:

And such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest on bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

By act of March, 1878, the retirement of these notes was prohibited, and their circulation was made perpetual. They have been held good by the Supreme Court, and are accepted by every person in the country without question. If they are good, the notes provided for in this bill can not be bad, for they are alike. Aside from that, it is submitted that if a bank check or the order of a merchant or trader is good for a few dollars or a hundred dollars, or a million, surely the nation's note ought to pass current among people who know that our aggregate wealth is equal to more than an average of a thousand dollars to every man, woman, and child within our boundaries. And every citizen expects the Government to endure.

As to the matter of the Government lending money to citizens, while at first sight this may seem a startling as well as a novel suggestion, yet, as matter of fact, we have been doing that very thing a long time. It is true, indeed, that the Government, State or National, has from the beginning been continually creating money in one form or other for the express purpose of its being lent to the people. We all understand well enough that there has not been in our history, nor in the history of any of the modern nations, a time when the people were without the use of money which was made for the purpose of its being lent to them.

As before suggested, the United States bank was established in order to get more money for the people to use, and coming through that channel we understand that the money will get to the people only by their borrowing it. All the provisions of the law were framed with that particular object in view. A bank of issue is created, so far as the feature of issuing the money is concerned, for the single purpose of lending money to the people. The Government is behind the bank. Without the legislative power of the people being brought into action the bank would have no power to issue any sort of money. Any person or any number of persons may do a banking business without the issuing attachment, and have no special authority of law for it; but when they would issue their notes to the people to be used as money, they must first have the authority of the legislature.

So in our present national-banking law, the object, as stated in the enacting clause, is to establish a national currency; that is to say, a species of paper money to be used among the people, and to be got to them by lending it and naming the security. There is no way for banks to get money out among the people other than to lend it to them. So it is not straining the construction of the law to say that the Government has been in the habit ever since we have been a nation, of authorizing banks to issue money to be lent to the people. The bill now before the Senate proposes to do nothing more than that, so far as this particular feature of the bill is concerned.

The only difference in practice which would result from the operation of the bill proposed by Senator STANFORD and the practice now in vogue is, that the Government in that case would do directly what in this case it does indirectly, that is to say, under the operation of this bill the Government would lend money to the people without the intervention of banks or any other agency, taking security from them with their obligation and enforcing it in favor of all the people, just the same as bankers and loan agents now lend money to the people and take security from them, the Government seeing that the securities are enforced in case of failure to pay. The Government has lent money directly to certain corporations, railroad companies, and others. It does more. It supplies the money which banks lend to their borrowers, and the constitutionality of this proceeding has not been questioned. The authority of the Government to lend money is no longer in dispute, but it is objected that the particular method proposed by this bill would do violence not only to existing customs but to the best and safest principles of financial management; that business would be deranged by it; that the conscience of the people would be shocked and credit be destroyed; that inflation would follow; that bankruptcy, disaster, and ruin would be the end.

But think a moment. It is the principle, not the particular plan, that I am discussing. There is no change proposed in this bill, as far as security is concerned, except in the mere matter of executing the loans and in collecting the debts in case of failure upon the part of the borrowers to pay. The same sort of security which has been accepted ever since men began to borrow money is proposed in this bill, that which is regarded as the best security among the people of all civilized nations, that which has been regarded as the best security by our own people and upon which all of our recorded debts are based, is what this bill proposes, namely, land—land owned and occupied or used by the borrowers. As the law now stands, and as it has been so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, land has been accepted as security for the payment of debts; it has been recognized under our laws as security, and our customs as well as our laws have been built upon that theory. Land is not only good security, but the lawmaking power has declared that when it is given as security all the powers of the Government will be brought to bear to enforce it.

To-day, if a borrower who has mortgaged land as security for the payment of a debt fails to pay at the time agreed upon, the creditor need only ask the court for judgment, and the machinery of the law is at once put in motion to collect the debt. The creditor is saved, though the debtor be lost. If the land has to be sold to make the payment, it is sold under laws and proceedings long, long ago established. If a city, county, township, school district, or any other local subdivision of territory is encumbered with debt in the form of bonds, upon failure to pay according to agreement the creditor asks judgment in court, and the law takes its course, to the extent, if need be, of the officers of the court levying taxes upon and selling the property of the people within the particular jurisdiction to pay the debt. The Government stands behind the creditor.

Under the operation of this bill the people of the United States would be the creditor. The same court and the same machinery of law now provided and in use would operate to collect debts in case the Government should be the lender, instead of individual persons, as we have it under present practice. Under this bill all the people of the country, in their organized capacity, would be the creditor, whereas at present one individual, or a number of individuals associated as a partnership or a corporation, is the creditor. There is that difference, and only that.

Prof. Sumner, in his "History of American Currency," refers to the land-loan system of Pennsylvania, adopted in 1723:

The issue was for £15,000 (about $75,000), put in the hands of commissioners in each county, according to the taxable assessment. The commissioners loaned the bills at 5 per cent on mortgage of land. The loan was for sixteen years, payable one-tenth annually, and the interest was to defray the expenses of government. Installments repaid during the first ten years of the period were to be loaned out again only for the remainder of the period.

Benjamin Franklin is the reputed author of the Pennsylvania paper-money system. He advocated it on two distinct grounds: One, the necessity of a currency, and the impossibility of keeping a sufficient supply of gold and silver in the country, and so, as he said before the committee of the House of Commons, if you can not have what you would prefer, the expediency of taking the next best thing; the other, the absolute advantages of this currency, even over the precious metals. One of these advantages was the revenue derived to the Government from it. In Pownall's Administration of the Colonies this subject is referred to in the following language:

In a country, under such circumstances, money lent to settlers upon interest creates money. Paper money thus lent upon interest will create gold and silver in principal, while the interest becomes a reserve that pays the charges of government. This is the true Pactolian stream, which converts all into gold that is washed by it. It is upon this principle that the wisdom and virtue of the Assembly of Pennsylvania established, under the sanction of Government, an office for the emission of paper money by loan.—See Pownall, Administration of the Colonies, 4th ed., p. 186.

Thomas Jefferson, in his writings, frequently alluded to the paper money used in the colonies.

Previous to the Revolution—

He says in one place—

most of the States were in the habit, whenever they had occasion for more money than could be raised immediately by taxes, to issue paper notes, or bills, in the name of the State, wherein they promised to pay the bearer the sum named in the note or bill. In some of the States no time of payment was fixed, nor tax laid to enable payment. In these the bills depreciated. But others of the States named in the bill the day when it should be paid, laid taxes to bring in money enough for that purpose, and paid the bill punctually on or before the day named. In these States paper money was in as high estimation as gold and silver.—Jefferson's Works, vol. 9, p. 248.

The Prussian states used paper money based on real-estate security many years ago quite satisfactorily, and some of the small German states are now using treasury notes as money.

Early in the eighteenth century Virginia used tobacco for money. It was stored in warehouses and the receipts for it passed as currency. Prof. Sumner says "it was true money."

In Russia, at this time, grain is stored, and the warehouse receipts are used as money.

Quoting my own language in another place:

The power vested in Congress and Congress alone to supply the people with money carries with it the duty to direct the application of the power in practice, just as the authority to create courts carries with it the power to assist the courts in the performance of their duties. Judges are not usually farmers, merchants, manufacturers, or railroad managers, yet it frequently happens that they must direct the management of farms, of mercantile establishments, manufacturing processes, and railroads. Death, failures in business, default in payment of dues, and neglect or refusal to meet engagements make it necessary for courts to appoint administrators, executors, referees, and receivers, with necessary assistants, to settle business which can not be settled in any other way. Vast interests are managed in this way by the Government through its officers, the judges and their appointees, and without any friction or failure. All this is quite practicable.

Look at the Post-Office Department, managed by the Government through one man. The Postmaster-General in a recent report describes the postal service of the United States as "the largest business concern in the world, consisting of a central establishment with almost 60,000 branches, and employing 150,000 people." And there is nothing impracticable in the working of this vast machine by the Government. He recommends the division of the country into twenty-six postal districts according to population and territory, with an executive officer at the head to look after the work personally. And there is nothing impracticable about that. The Secretary of War, through agents, purchases supplies for the Army, including farm products, grain, flour, hay, horses, meat, cattle, manufactured goods, clothing, shoes, and camp and garrison equipage.

The Secretary of the Navy goes into the market for a great variety of articles which he procures through agents. * * * The Secretary of the Interior superintends schools and instructs Indians in the art of farming, and he has under his direction an army of agents and clerks, all operating under a system which works perfectly. The Secretary of Agriculture has charge of experiment stations in every State; he superintends the making of sugar, the raising of new varieties of grain and trees, and he has men out continually looking at the farm and stock interests. * * * The Secretary of the Treasury conducts a business amounting to thousands of millions of dollars annually. And all these things are practicable for the Government to do. * * * Taking the census requires an army of people—between 40,000 and 50,000—and every house in the country is visited by Government agents. Perfectly practicable. * * *

The Comptroller of the Currency, October 30, 1889, had charge of 3,262 national banks, with a circulation of $131,000,000, and doing a business amounting to a hundred times that much in the course of a year. The Comptroller's report for 1888 says: "The monetary transactions of the Government have been conducted through the offices of the Treasurer of the United States, nine assistant treasurers, and 297 national-bank depositories." The Treasurer's report for 1889 shows that of the 3,262 national banks doing business the Government had designated 270 of them as depositories through which the Treasury acts in distributing money direct from the Treasury, and they held public moneys amounting to $47,259,714. A year before the amount was $58,712,511.

The proposition that the Government shall lend money to the people on real estate security is in no respect like the method of land hypothecation practiced in the Argentine Republic, as many persons suppose. Mr. Consul Baker gave a clear statement of that practice in his report under date August 10, 1889, as it appears on pages 653 and 654 Consular Reports Nos. 108, 109, 110, and 111, 1889. It is as follows:

NATIONAL HYPOTHECARY BANK.

In addition to the usual legal facilities for borrowing money on mortgage, the Argentine Congress has by law established a great national mortgage bank, whose special functions are to make loans on the hypothecation of real estate. The law creating this bank was passed on the 14th of September, 1886. The President, in his last message to Congress, speaks of it as "an institution which will greatly multiply the elements of credit in the Republic;" and the minister of finance, in a speech he made in the House of Deputies a few days ago, declared that "the bank is a great boon to the people for the reason that land is the great patrimony, the immense capital of the country, and every facility should be given to mobilize that capital and increase its value."

By its franchises this bank can operate in all the provinces and territories of the Republic. Its functions are not to loan money on mortgage, but to issue transferable mortgage bonds (cédulas) on the execution of mortgages in its favor, which cédulas are put upon the market and sold for what they will fetch by the holders, and the nation guaranties to the holders the service of the interest and amortization. They are made payable to bearer, and they bear an annual fixed interest not to exceed 8 per cent and an annual accumulative sinking fund for their ultimate payment, the maximum of which shall not exceed 2 per cent. The bank is managed in the capital of the Republic by a board of control, consisting of a chairman and eight directors, appointed by the President, and in the different provinces and territories by means of administrative councils. The board can make no loan of less than $1,000 or more than $250,000 to any one person, nor can any provincial council grant loans of more than $5,000 unless specially authorized by the board. The face of the cédulas can not be less than $25 nor greater than $1,000. The responsibility for loans is not limited to the property mortgaged, but extends to all other property the mortgagee may possess, so far as the excess is concerned, in which case the order of preference to be followed is that laid down in the civil code.

The central bank is the only one that delivers the cédulas though the mortgage deeds be executed in the provinces; and no loan can be granted for more than half the value of the property mortgaged. A delay of over sixty days in the payment of the hypothecary obligation authorizes the bank to put up for sale by public auction the property or properties mortgaged without any legal proceedings and to award them to the highest bidder. To provide for the expenses of the bank, and to guaranty punctuality in the service of the cédulas, a credit of $2,000,000 is kept open in the national bank in favor of the National Mortgage Bank. No loans can be made on mines and quarries nor on joint properties unless the mortgage be made on the whole of the property with the consent of all the joint owners declared by means of a public deed, nor on properties which may be rented for a term of more than five years at the date of the contract for the loan, nor on properties which may not be susceptible of producing an income.

It will be seen that the Mortgage Bank of Argentine was not established, and is not conducted for the purpose of assisting the people in the management of their daily business, nor is it intended to increase the supply of government money. It is a scheme to aid speculators in "mobilizing" their lands. The Argentine Government does not issue and lend money to the people on real-estate security. It only authorizes the bank to issue certificates showing that certain lands have been mortgaged at a certain valuation. The certificates may then be sold in the open market, just as we sell shares of mining stock, or railroad or bank stock, for money. The Government puts out no money on these mortgages. Its obligation begins and ends with securing the payment of the interest, and the money for that purpose is raised by sale of the land if need be.

The proposition in the Stanford bill is to lend money to the people, not to issue certificates of debt to them and then send them out among traders to realize money on the certificates at high rates of discount. This bill would supply the common need of money from the Government direct and as nearly as practicable at cost, avoiding the danger and risk attending the reliance on a few interested persons for what money may be needed in the people's business. This bill would place the financial interests of the country in the hands of the people, while the Argentine plan only strengthens the power of money lenders, as was plainly shown in the last two years' history of that country.

The need of more money and a more general and continual circulation of it is one of the necessities of modern conditions. It has been the common experience of all advanced nations that metallic money is a treacherous factor. At the time it is most needed it is not at hand. Men fail in business because they can not obtain money, because they can not realize on their paper, and from various other causes. But no men ever failed because of an abundance of money. Beginning with 1837, there are gentlemen in this Chamber who can remember half a dozen disastrous money crises in our own history. Not one of them was caused by reason of superabundance of money, nor because the Government had issued too many paper dollars.

When banks suspended specie payments, it was because they had not enough money. When our Government suspended specie payment, it was because we were short on money. When the panic of 1873 came with its flood of destruction, it was because money was scarce; there was not enough to be obtained by men who were in debt, though many thousands had good security to offer. When Barings failed, it was because they were short on money, and whenever and wherever we learn of financial disturbances, we know it is because there is not enough money to carry on the business of the people. Every great monetary crisis reveals the fact that money is scarce; but not one case in all history can be cited where any people ever suffered harm by reason of having too much money. Give the people an abundance of money and you give them energy; thrift follows, and the country grows. Take away money and you bring ruin to the doors. With plenty of money the people prosper; without enough, prices fall, labor is without reward, the poor grow poorer. Another thing. They who suffer most from money panics are they who can least afford to lose—the poor men and women whose living depends on their daily earnings. To the poor man, the loss of a day may bring him to want. To the woman whose wages barely sustain life, the loss of an hour tells in the next meal she eats. And the great fact grows more apparent as the cruel lash of the civilizer falls upon its victims.

As the young years come to us, and we welcome them with song and prayer, we do not stop to think how much the inventions and devices of the time will take from the earnings of the toilers. Once a woman received 50 cents for making a man's shirt; now she makes a dozen shirts for that amount, and lives in the border land of want. Once a shoemaker received $2 for making a pair of shoes; now he attends a machine which makes only a part of a shoe, a very small part indeed, and his employer sells the finished article at 35 cents to 75 cents a pair. We are diversifying our employments, we are dividing and subdividing work on particular things, we are multiplying devices to cheapen production, we are driving the worker on to smaller margins of profit every year, diminishing his resources continually, taking away from him his defenses, weakening his influence in society, in politics, and religion, narrowing the field of his effort, increasing wants while refusing to add to his means of satisfying them. The demand for money is the appeal of toil.

Men and women who work in the fields, in the shops and factories, on the highways and in the mines, these, who of all the world should first be paid—these nation-builders—they whose hands have fashioned all that we see of labor's work about us—they ask for money, more money, that the land may bloom again. And that vast and growing army of men and women to whom the sunshide is shadow, to whom the coming day throws gloom ahead, to them what gladness would come with the beginning of a reign of plenty. How many idle men and women in this, the city of Washington—men and women begging for employment! They walk the streets, they besiege Congressmen and Senators, they swarm about the Capitol and in the corridors, asking for something to do. Nine of every ten persons of these thousands are honestly seeking employment that they may earn a living.

A large part of the correspondence of the members of this body and of the other House is made up of appeals for assistance in one form or other. Fully two-thirds of the bills which have been introduced in the Senate during the present session are bills asking for special pecuniary relief. And this condition grows and spreads. These people join the popular clamor for more money. How much conditions would be improved by a large increase of circulating money, no man would be brave enough to state; but that progress and thrift have uniformly been contemporaneous with a large volume of money actually circulating among the people is a fact of history. No man doubts that with a large increase of money put into the channels of trade a revival of business would follow, and the labor of the country would be employed; farming would pay, and we should have "good times" again.

Let it be understood, however, that it is not only more money that is demanded. Two other things must be done as well. First, the money must be put in circulation; and second, it must be kept there. These things can be brought about in two ways: (1) Lend the money, with reasonable limitations, to needy persons who can offer good security against loss, and (2) reduce the rate of interest so that it will be below rather than above the average profits on labor when employed in farming and other industrial pursuits. This will insure the absorption of a large amount of money, and it will prevent its return to money centers; because in that case men can do as well in any of the ordinary vocations as they can in lending money. These desirable conditions would follow the adoption of the principle on which this bill is drawn. A large proportion of our farmers are in debt, as the census reports thus far published show. These people would gladly borrow money at a rate of interest which would allow them a margin of profit to apply on the principal, and thus in a few years they could redeem their lands with the difference saved between the old high rate and the new low rate. The average cost of borrowed money now to the borrower is about 10 per cent. Under the plan proposed in this bill, the cost would be 2 per cent, a difference of 8 per cent, which in twelve and a half years would pay the entire principal. This money would go at once into circulation.

And the amount of money needed to relieve the farmers would not be as large as many persons imagine. Assuming the farm debt of the country to be $2,500,000, an issue of $500,000,000, if judiciously handled, would be sufficient to begin the work, a yearly addition of $100,000,000 for ten years, would be sufficient to meet all the requirements; and by that time a yearly increase of $100,000,000 would not be too much for the business necessities of the people. A farmer borrows $1,000, say, to pay a pressing debt; that amount is immediately put into some productive industry in order to yield a return, and thus it gets into circulation. Or, in case the law should provide (and I think that would be an improvement on this bill) that private persons might lend money at 3 per cent or 4 per cent, during a period of, say, five years—long enough for all money lenders to adjust their business to the new conditions without loss, in which case much of the money paid to creditors would be reloaned to other farmers whose debts were not closely pressing, and who would be glad to reduce their interest payments.

In this way $1,000 would probably pay ten or twelve times that amount of farm debts in a year. The annual payments of principal and interest to the Government would amount to a large sum, and that would be at once reloaned, and thus kept in circulation. By the time the borrowing period had passed, the rate of interest would have become uniform in all parts of the country; the people would have control of their financial interests, and money panics would be known no more forever.

And what then, Mr. President? Remove from the vitals of the people the destroying virus of the usurer, lift from their homes the incubus of debt, dispel the clouds which hover about the farmer's horizon, put life into trade, carry bread and cheer to the toilers, let the sunshine pour into every household, and you will plant a new civilization here; you will bring God close to the people, you will raise the lowly and banish caste, you will drive despair away, you will empty prisons, destroy anarchy, cure drunkenness, Christianize the home, ennoble citizenship, nationalize the people, and perpetuate the Republic.

Mr. STANFORD. I ask that the bill may lie on the table for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 18) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas.

UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is, I believe, entitled to the floor on the regular order which is now before the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order may be temporarily laid aside until I can submit a report and make a request of the Senate. It will only take a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield for that purpose?

Mr. DOLPH. I will consent to that if the measure to be reported by the Senator from Missouri does not lead to discussion, reserving the right to object if it does.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri, to report it back favorably without amendment, and to recommend its passage, and to ask for the present consideration of the bill. It is a very short bill, and there is a very short report accompanying it, which will fully explain the situation and the necessity for urgent and prompt action upon the measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri. It directs the Secretary of War to relieve the University of the State of Missouri, at Columbia, Mo., from all money responsibility for so much of the ordnance and ordnance stores issued to that university, under its bond, dated April 7, 1886, as was destroyed by fire on January 9, 1892.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let the report be read, with a letter from the Secretary of War, which explains the whole thing.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the report long, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a very short report.

Mr. CHANDLER. Would it not be just as well for the Senator to make a brief statement?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the report is about as short as I could make the statement. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Including the letter from the Secretary of War?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be first read and then the letter from the Secretary of War. It is a very short statement of the case in brief.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of Missouri, have duly considered the same and submit the following report:

This bill authorizes the Secretary of War to relieve the University of Missouri from the obligations of the bond given to the United States for the return of arms and equipments issued by the War Department to the university under existing laws, and which were totally destroyed by fire on January 9, 1892, together with the main building of said university, without any fault or neglect on the part of the officers of said university.

The board of curators of the University of Missouri applied to the Secretary of War for relief from liability on the bond and for an issue of arms and equipments in lieu of those destroyed. In behalf of this application Senator COCKRELL addressed the Secretary and received in reply the said bill and the accompanying letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 20, 1892.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 18th instant, in reference to the Government arms recently destroyed by fire in the Missouri State University, I have the honor to advise you that the Department has always held in such cases that, the return of these arms and equipments to the United States being secured by a bond given to the United States, it is beyond the power of the Secretary of War to relieve any person from the obligations of such a bond, and that only Congress can grant the relief asked for.

Congress has already passed acts relieving certain colleges from responsibility for losses sustained by them by fire. As requested, a form of an act relieving the University of Missouri in this case is herewith inclosed. When this is enacted into law, new arms and equipments will be issued in lieu of those destroyed.

Very respectfully,

S. B. ELKINS, Secretary of War.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

In pursuance of the recommendations of the Secretary of War and numerous precedents your committee report the bill back to the Senate and recommend its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will simply state that the university building, the entire building, with a very large and valuable library, and all its contents, including the arms and accouterments, was totally destroyed by fire, and now the university can not get credit upon its bond for the arms and equipments so destroyed and can get no issue. This measure is simply presented at the instance of the Secretary of War, to relieve the university and enable him to issue new arms and accouterments.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not choose to yield for that motion, for I am opposed to an adjournment over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. DOLPH. I decline to yield the floor for that motion, for I am not in favor of adjourning over until Monday. We have a Calendar six pages in length, and I do not think the Senate should adjourn over for two days in the week.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield.

Mr. DOLPH subsequently said: Having had an opportunity to put in my objection to an adjournment over Friday and Saturday, I will yield to the Senator from Nevada with the hope that the Senate will vote the motion down.

Mr. STEWART. I now move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and

The bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION REGENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 18) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than members of Congress shall be filled by the appointment of William Preston Johnston, of Louisiana, in place of Noah Porter, of Connecticut, resigned, and the appointment of John B. Henderson, a citizen of the District of Columbia, in place of Montgomery C. Meigs, deceased, and by the appointment of Henry Coppée, of Pennsylvania, whose term of office expired on December 26, 1891.

Mr. GIBSON of Louisiana. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

FOOD AND DRUG ADULTERATION.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for one moment?

Mr. DOLPH. For what purpose?

Mr. PADDOCK. To give notice.

Mr. DOLPH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to give notice that when Order of Business 64, Senate bill No. 1, shall be reached on the Calendar, which will be, I suppose, on Monday, or Tuesday at the latest, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that measure, whatever else may be under consideration at the time, as a general or special order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator state more distinctly what the bill is?

Mr. PADDOCK. It is a bill to prevent the adulteration and misbranding of food and drugs.

Mr. DOLPH. And what is the notice?

Mr. PADDOCK. The notice is that when the bill is reached on the Calendar, which is now No. 64, I shall ask that the bill be taken up and its consideration continued until it shall be disposed of.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868."

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, no one regrets more than I do the amount of time I have already consumed and which it will be necessary for me to consume in order to present the bill now under consideration to the Senate intelligently. I only regret that the number of Senators who have listened to the discussion is not as great as it should be.

Yesterday I proceeded to examine to some extent the questions of law which had been raised by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and to read from the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States an opinion which in my judgment disposed of them all. I had also proceeded to show from the testimony taken before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that certain letters written by the agents of the La Abra Mining Company at the mine in Mexico, and certain letters received by the agents at the mine from D. J. Garth, the treasurer of the company, and from Mr. Exall after his return to New York, were genuine letters. I then had proceeded to show that the receipt by the officers in New York of the letters written by the agents at the mine was admitted.

I had then read from the memorial of the claimant to show the character of its claim as to the value of their mines, the misconduct of the Mexicans, etc. I was then proposing to show from the testimony that, notwithstanding this large claim for damages against the Mexican Government, no officer or agent of the company, prior to filing its memorial before the Commission had ever made a claim to the United States Government, through our State Department, or against the Mexican Government, or even to the American consul at Mazatlan. I will proceed now upon that point. I will read from the memorial which was filed before the Mixed Commission, from page 329 of the report of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of the memorial?

Mr. DOLPH. The memorial was sworn and subscribed to on the 14th of June, 1870, but I do not see the date of the filing. It was presumably shortly after that. In the memorial it is stated:

That the claim was not presented prior to February 1, 1869, to the Department of State of either Government, or to the minister of the United States at Mexico.

That is a statement contained in the memorial itself. I also read from the testimony of Mr. Garth, on page 184 of the committee's report, as follows:

Q. Did you appeal to the Mexican Government in any way?
A. Not that I know of. I did not.
Q. Well, did your company?
A. Not to my knowledge.
Q. If they had done it would you have known it?
A. I think so.
Q. Then the case is that your agent came off and left $350,000 worth of property there, and that you neither made inquiry about it, or made any appeal to the Government of Mexico or appeal to the Government of the United States about it, and that you sent no agent there to look after it, but merely gave it up?
A. That was the condition of things.

That is the testimony of the treasurer of the company. I also read from Mr. Garth's testimony after being recalled and reëxamined, which is found on pages 832 and 833 of the report:

Q. Was any legal advice taken at that time?

That is, at the time the mine was to be abandoned.

A. I think not; not that I know.
Q. Was any communication made to the Government at Washington?
A. Not that I know of. The thing just fell dead.

Mr. MORGAN. Was not Garth the largest stockholder?

Mr. DOLPH. I think he was. He was one of the principal stockholders and one of the promoters of the company.

Q. Now, I desire to ask you whether Mr. Exall made any report upon his return to New York at that meeting of any protest that he had filed before any American authority at any place?
A. I don't recollect of any, sir. I don't recollect whether he made a verbal or whether he made—I don't think he made any written report.
Q. Yes, I am asking you not whether he made a verbal or written report, but whether he made any protest?
A. That he had filed any claim or made any protest or anything of that sort?

That is the witness.

Q. Before any American authority or any other authority?
A. I don't recollect it, sir.
Q. Do you remember whether he reported to you that when he came from Mazatlan on his return to New York he met the American consul, Mr. Sisson, there?
A. I have no recollection of it.
Q. Did he report to you whether he called at the consulate at Mazatlan?
A. I don't recollect it, sir.
Q. Or made any statement or protest before Mr. Sisson?
A. I don't remember of any.

And he did not as a matter of fact.

Now I proceed to another proposition, and read again from the report of the committee, which I propose to establish beyond all controversy in the same manner by the testimony:

The date fixed by Exall, in his deposition before the Commission, of his expulsion from the mines was on or about March 20, 1868. An original letter of Exall's was produced in evidence before the committee, dated at Mazatlan (the seaport, 150 miles from the mines), March 15, 1868, which shows that he had been at that place some days when the letter was written, and that he had left the property and mines in the quiet possession of Granger, his assistant; that he was on his way to San Francisco and New York, to obtain money from the company to pay the overdue salary of himself and his assistant, Granger, and that he expected to return. It was also proved before the committee that Exall met the United States consul when he passed through Mazatlan, and that he made no complaint to him and said nothing to him about any trouble with the authorities or people at the mines.

I will not stop to read what Exall says in his deposition before the Mixed Commission in regard to his flight, because I assert that that is all false, but I will read from his letter to Granger, from Mazatlan, on page 322 of the committee's report. This letser was written on the 15th of March, 1868, and five days before Exall, in his deposition, stated that he was driven from the mine and the Mexicans had interfered with his working it, so that he was compelled to abandon it.

Mr. GEORGE. That was copied from the letterpress books?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. Written by whom?

Mr. DOLPH. By Exall, the superintendent of the mine, from the seaport down at Mazatlan, when he started to New York and turned the mine over to Granger:

DEAR GRANGER: I wrote you by Rice, and said everything I thought necessary. Since writing something else has transpired, which I think it best to post you on. On yesterday Bartning and I had another conversation in reference to the draft matter, but I gave him no satisfaction in the affair. He seemed particularly anxious for me to acknowledge the debt, and that the money had been used for the benefit of the company. His object in this is plain. He wants to get some hold on the company, which he has not now. I told him I would consult with Ralston in the matter, but of course Mr. R. will get nothing more from me than Mr. B.

In reference to the La Abra affairs, I think we will have to look to this country. The property can not be sold without legal authority from the company. This I think I can get. Am induced to believe so by the company letters received. In fact, it would be difficult to get a purchaser without authority to sell. I am certain of being able to get some power from them, so as to enable us to secure ourselves.

The great effort was to get back salary for both of them, which, as I will show pretty soon, had not been paid, the company refusing to send funds, and now the whole thing was to be abandoned and they were simply looking after their salary.

I will communicate with company from San Francisco, and, if best, will go on immediately to New York and return as soon as possible. Please keep everything in the best possible shape and secure, and by no means let my books be seen or known. It is to the interest of us both to do so; therefore I know you will act as I advise in the matter.

I will say the idea of not showing the books was so as not to show that the mine was a failure, the poor quality of the ore, and the results of the assays from the workings of the mills.

I have been quite sick since being here, and at one time was afraid wouldn't be able to go up. Am now much better, and hope to be off to-morrow. The line is so arranged now that you can get from New York to Mazatlan in twenty days, so I will not be gone very long—so I will not be gone very long. Please act prudently in this matter, and in a few months I think I will be able to put us both right. Be sure and write me by next steamer to San Francisco. I will make arrangements in San Francisco to receive them or elsewhere. Direct care of Weil & Co. You will get their number from the books. Hoping that you may get along all right, and that I will be soon again with you with means to satisfy ourselves,

I remain, your friend,

CHARLES H. EXALL.

That was five days before the time the mine was alleged to have been abandoned. This letter shows that this man was at a Mexican seaport, ready to take passage for San Francisco for the purpose of going to New York, to endeavor to get the company to make some arrangement by which he and Granger could get their pay even if the company abandoned the mine. They wanted to get something out of it, and the company would not put up money to pay the debts and run the mine.

I also quote from page 809 of the committee's report of the testimony to show that Exall met the United States consul and made no complaint. This is a witness who met Mr. Exall at Mazatlan. He says:

By Mr. LINES:

Q. Left home?
A. December, 1866. We will get at it after a while.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Now, let us have it as nearly correct as you can fix it. You left home when?
A. December, 1866.
Q. And arrived at Mazatlan when?
A. February, 1867.
Q. You met Exall when?
A. I think in 1867.
Q. About what month?
A. Well, I should say in February.
Q. February, 1867?
A. Yes.
Q. Where was he going?
A. I think he was going home; going to take the steamer.
Q. Did you have any conversation with him?
A. Merely an introduction, I think, and that was all.
Q. Did he call at the consulate on any official business?
A. No, sir; not with me.
Q. He had no conversation with you about any official business?
A. No, sir.

Q. Had nothing to say to you that directed your attention to any business that would be required of you as consul?
A. No, sir.

This is the consul at Mazatlan at the time who is testifying. He testified that he met Exall, and Exall made no complaint. Now I read from the report of the committee:

Copies of other letters of Exall, found in the letterpress copy book, show that Granger was still in peaceable possession August 12, 1868—

That is, several months after it is alleged they were driven from the mines that Granger, the man who was left there by Exall by written authority in possession of the mine, was in possession August 12, 1868—

undisturbed by the authorities, and witnesses have testified before the committee that he continued to occupy the premises owned by La Abra Company for a considerable time thereafter, and that, receiving no aid or remittances of money from the company in New York—

he proceeded to sell off such of the movable property as he could so dispose of, to pay his own claims against the company, and that he at last voluntarily abandoned the property.

The law of Mexico authorized the proceeding to sell off the property, the authority for which was obtained by application to a magistrate, something in the nature of a legal proceeding.

It is also shown that the Mexican authorities did not claim to exercise any control or authority over the property of the company after Exall's departure and that since Granger ceased to occupy the premises they have been taken possession of by individual miners, under the Mexican law of denouncement, as abandoned property.

That is to say, when the claimant discontinued working the mines and abandoned them any person had a right to go and denounce them and work them. Not only has one person done that, but they have been denounced by several persons in succession, who when they ascertained that the mines would not pay for working abandoned them.

Mr. MORGAN. Substantially the same mining statute that we have.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I read from pages 318, 512, and 535 of the report to show that the mine was in Granger's possession. I read from page 318 first. This is a letter written to Señor Don Remigio Rocha, and dated Tayoltita, August 12, 1868—the August after it was alleged these people were driven out. Now, see the character of the letter:

DEAR SIR: I have received the communication calling upon this company to pay $52.50 each month for taxes imposed by the legislature of the State, and presume it to be correct; but as I am only acting in the absence of the superintendent, and as there is no money nor effects to pay this tax, I beg you to wait until the month of November, at which time said superintendent is to come, and then the sums due by this company on account of this tax will be paid.

Your most humble servant,

SANTIAGO GRANGER.

That does not look very much as if the Mexican Government had turned these people out of possession. Here is their agent in possession and begging for an indulgence in regard to the payment of the taxes lawfully levied upon the property.

Mr. GEORGE. What was the date of the abandonment as proved?

Mr. DOLPH. It was stated by Exall to have been the 20th of March, 1868, the previous March, and this is the 12th of August.

Mr. MORGAN. The same year.

Mr. GEORGE. That was proved before the Commission?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. I also read from page 512 of the report. The name of this witness is Francisco Torres.

Francisco Torres; 61 years; San Dimas; miner and refiner of metals in his own property and in others.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

Q. At the little house near the principal hacienda when he saw Granger, who was it that was then superintendent of the company?

These interrogatories were propounded through an interpreter to be translated to the witness as he was examined through an interpreter.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Yes; superintendent or representative of the company?
A. Don Santiago Granger was recognized as such there.
Q. As what?
A. He represented there the hacienda.
Q. Was El Mudo there?
A. He did not see him.
Q. Did he know or hear anything of his whereabouts; where he was?
A. He had left, but he did not know where he had gone.
Q. How long was it after the visit that he made in September or October—when Granger talked with him about the condition of the hacienda, that he made this next visit he speaks of?

That is 1868—

A. He says about three or four months.

After September or October, 1868.

Q. Does he know who remained in charge of the hacienda after this last visit?
A. Don Santiago Granger remained at the head of the business until the end.
Q. What does he know of Granger's operations, or what disposition did Granger make of the property of the company?
A. He sold some things, as salt, quicksilver, and tools, and one wheel of the machinery was taken out and sold to Don Carlos Dahlgren, and tools were sold to Don Juan Cuevas.
Q. To whom was this salt, quicksilver, and other articles he mentions sold?
A. To Mr. Rice, superintendent of the Durango Mining Company, and to some other miners—people of El Baluarte.
Q. To any other owners of mines or workers of mines in that neighborhood?
A. He does not know exactly whether there were any others. He says that whenever opportunity offered a sale was made, but that he did not know particularly the names of the purchasers.

Here we have proof from a witness that this man Granger remained in possession for three or four months after September or October, 1868, and failing, as it will hereafter be seen, to get any remittance from New York, he proceeded, as the law authorized him to do, to dispose of some of the property to pay what was coming to him.

I read from page 535 upon the same branch of the subject:

Ask him if he knew—

This witness is Eugenio Somero. There were witnesses brought to testify to facts within their knowledge from the vicinity of the mines.

By Mr. DOLPH:

Q. Ask him what he was doing at Tayoltita in 1836 and 1867 when he was there.
A. He was engaged in commercial business on a small scale.
Q. Ask him if he then knew the representatives of La Abra Company there.
A. Yes.
Q. Ask him who they were.
A. A general man named Bartholow and another gentleman who was called the colonel, but he does not know the name.
Q. Ask him if he knows what mines of the company were working at that time and what they were doing there.
A. They were working El Cristo and La Luz mines.
Q. Ask him who was in possession of those mines, if any one, in 1872, after he returned to San Dimas, when he has visited Tayoltita.
A. He says that the mines were abandoned, and that the only one who exercised a certain kind of superintendency was Don Santiago Granger, and the mines were in complete abandonment.

That is as late as 1872, several years afterwards.

Q. Were there any mining operations going on then?
A. No.
Q. Any property there in the hacienda belonging to the company?
A. He says that the company had there the hacienda with what had been left of the machinery. No work was done.

Granger sold the property to pay his debts. I was about to read from pages 420, 421, 422, and 427 of the report. I think, however, that is sufficiently shown in the testimony of witnesses already given. There is an abundance of other testimony to show the fact that Granger did sell this property from the hacienda and testimony here showing how it was done. Here is the copy of the paper which he presented to the local judge, declaring the circumstances and alleging what the value of the property was, so that the value might be fixed in any future settlement with the company about the property.

I now read from page 657 of the report of the committee. This is in the testimony of Charles B. Dahlgren. He says his name is Charles B. Dahlgren; 49 years old last October; present residence, Battle Mountain, Nev.; occupation, miner.

He was either a son or a nephew, I think, of Admiral Dahlgren:

Q. Did Judge Quiroz ever make any claim to you of ownership of that property or the control of it by the Mexican authorities as the owner of it?
A. No, sir; he did not. He claimed the right of protecting the property against being pillaged.
Q. I now read from House Executive Document No. 274, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 112. I propose to read your application to the judge and his answer:

"Charles B. Dahlgren, resident of this mining district and general administrator of the American company entitled Durango Mining Company of New York, appears before you, making faithful and legal manifestation that, being in need of his machinery used in the reduction of ores, of an iron wheel belonging to the machinery of La Abra Mining Company, of Tayoltita"—

Not to the Mexican Government, but belonging to this mining company—and which has been abandoned, he is going to dispose of said wheel, as also of its attachments. On making known to you what he intends to do, it is with the object that note of it be taken by the court in your worthy charge, so as to make it public, and that the value thereof be charged to him, to which effect he makes the necessary protestations to pay what he will be made responsible for either by a cash payment or by the return of said wheel.

He requests your honor to be pleased to keep this petition in your court for his responsibility at all times, and publish it, should you think necessary to do it.

CHARLES B. DAHLGREN,
Administrator of the Durango Mining Company of New York.

SAN DIMAS, May 23, 1872.

Here it is shown that the mine in 1872 was abandoned, and here is the superintendent of another mining company going to the judge of the court and, in accordance with the law, indicating his intention to take that wheel and fixing his responsibility to the owners for it, either to be returned to the owners or to be paid for. That is in 1872, four years after, long after this petition was filed and this award given. This is a public document. Now the mines were abandoned and denounced. I read from pages 512, 513, 514, and 535 of the report of the committee. I first read from page 512. This is the witness I have already referred to, Francisco Torres:

Q. Is Granger now living?
A. He died in some place between Durango and El Porto.
Q. He has referred to the time when he worked La Luz mine as proprietor or associated with Granger.

Granger went on and tried to work the mine in connection with this man.

Ask him if he can fix approximately when he was so engaged?
A. He can not say exactly, but he thinks it was some time between 1868 and 1871.
Q. By whom was the mine denounced, if it was denounced?
The INTERPRETER. Which mine, La Luz?
Q. La Luz, or whatever the mine was called?
A. When he began to work in the mine the mine was not denounced, but afterwards Granger——
Q. Well, he says how he worked; with whose permission; he stated that he worked with the permission of some person?
A. Yes; with the permission of Granger, and then it was denounced by Granger.

The mine itself was denounced by the company's employé left there in charge, as the law permitted, and after it had been abandoned by the company.

Q. Does he remember what was the name of the mine denounced?
A. El Rosario mine.
Q. Under that denouncement he worked La Luz mine?
A. He says he worked in La Luz; he denounced the Rosario, and, with the Rosario, he took hold of La Luz.
Q. Ask him how far apart these two mines were?
A. A little over 100 yards.
Q. Under what arrangement did he work those mines with Granger?
A. The arrangement was to work in partnership, but Granger failed to contribute his share of the money, and he had to put out of his own pocket the money.
Q. How long did he work La Luz mine?
A. About two years.
Q. What was the result of the working of the mine?
A. Very bad result; he lost about $9,000.
Q. What was the character of the ore taken out of the mine at the time he worked?
A. Very poor; yielding 12 ounces per load.
Q. Was that sufficient to pay for extracting the ore?
A. It was not sufficient.
Q. After El Mudo left Tayoltita in what condition were the mines which belonged to La Abra Company left?
A. In very bad condition.
Q. Were they worked by any person?
A. He says that a man named Salazar did some little work there, but lost also.
Q. State whether the mines were open to denouncement during this time, or what condition they were in as to that.
Mr. KENNEDY. Pardon me one moment, Mr. Chairman. Would it not be better to see if the witness knows what the laws of Mexico are in regard to denouncement before that question is asked?
Mr. FOSTER. I should think, after he has testified that he had been engaged in the business from his youth, he would know,
Mr. KENNEDY. The question was, were the mines open to denouncement? My objection is that it ought to appear first whether the witness knows——
Mr. DOLPH. Is the question withdrawn?
Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I will withdraw it, and try to put it in such form as to obviate the objection.
Q. After El Mudo left were the mines abandoned, or what was their condition as to working?
A. After El Mudo left the mines were abandoned.
Q. Were they open to denouncement by the public?
A. They were open to denouncement and have been denounced since that.
Q. Have these different mines been worked by different parties since El Mudo left?
A. Several persons have worked there, the witness himself, Salazar, Eugenio Somera, Don Antonio Salazar.
Q. What has been the result of the working of the persons that he has named?

Then comes an interruption by counsel, which I will not read.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Ask him if he knows what the result of the working of the mines by the persons named has been?
A. They all lost everything that they put in, invested there.

I now quote again from the report:

The history of the company, as disclosed by the testimony, inbrief, is as follows: The attention of certain gentlemen in New York was directed to La Abra mine, in the State of Durango, Mexico, which was claimed to have produced fabulous wealth in the time of the Spanish domination, and which, although in recent years abandoned, it was asserted would again produce great wealth if a projected tunnel was completed. A syndicate was formed in New York, and two of its members accompanied the "promoters" of La Abra sale to Mexico to inspect the mine. Neither of the two members of the syndicate possessed any knowledge of mining, and the experts who participated in the negotiation were all connected with the selling parties.

At the mines the representatives of the syndicate were shown very rich specimens of ores, assaying as high as $1,300 per ton, and as a result of their investigation they made a purchase on the spot of La Abra mine, paying for the same $22,000 in stock of the company. They also bought of a Spaniard and a Mexican a number of other mines at the same place, and paid for them $50,000 in gold. These mines were represented to be at that time producing very rich ores, and the syndicate were shown by the owners "stacks of silver. * * * some tons * * * of pure silver," the supposed recent product of these latter mines.

This statement probably will not be disputed by the opponents of this bill, and therefore I will not take time to refer to the testimony to support it. It shows how badly they were fooled and cheated in the purchase of these mines.

The representatives of the syndicate returned to New York, and La Abra Company was incorporated, and proceeded to make preparations to work the mines on a large scale with the improved American methods. The Mexican machinery and improvements were removed. New machinery was bought in California, and new buildings were erected for the enlarged operations of the company. Owing to the remoteness and mountainous character of the locality, and the disturbed condition of the country occasioned by the French war then in progress, this work was greatly delayed and unexpectedly expensive. While it was in progress, a large amount of ore was extracted from the mines; and when the mill was finished and the ores began to be reduced to silver, it was found that they were of a very low grade and would not pay for the cost of mining and reduction.

They had gone on to get out from the mines by the expensive and slow processes then employed, I think large quantities of ore being carried upon the backs of Mexicans, in anticipation of the time when they would be able to reduce it by mills, understanding that it was very rich. I read in support of this statement, from pages 125 and 126 of the report of the committee, from the testimony of Garth referring to his visit to Mexico and return to New York:

Q. Was that your last visit to Mexico?
A. That is the only one.
Q. How long after the company was organized——

Mr. MORGAN. On what page is that?

Mr. DOLPH. On page 126. It is the testimony of David J. Garth, who made a trip himself to Mexico.

Q. Was that your last visit to Mexico?
A. That is the only one.
Q. How long after the company was organized before you took charge of it as general financial manager in New York?
A. I don't remember. Mr. Hearn was the first president, and Sidney Shackelford was the treasurer and secretary, I think; I don't remember about it now. I had something to do with the advising, etc.
Q. This money for stock was paid in very soon after your return?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you have a meeting of the stockholders, to explain to them the situation in Mexico?
A. Yes, sir; those who were there; just a meeting there. I explained it to them.
Q. Did you get any permit in Mexico from any of the authorities, civil or military, to open this mine or to conduct the business out there?
A. I don't remember any.
Q. Was the country much in agitation when you went there over the war that was progressing?
A. Well, I do not think much, in that particular section. It was a mighty out-of-the-way place; an ignorant kind of people out there. I don't think they cared much for government or anything else.
Q. They are not very loyal to any government, are they?
A. I don't know about that.
Q. Is the country infested with robbers—banditti?
A. I suppose, more or less.
Q. You heard of them out there?
A. I did hear of them occasionally.
Q. Were there any American companies in the vicinity of the hacienda that you bought, mining for silver or gold, when you got there?
A. There was; at San Dimas, I think, about 10 miles off.
Q. Do you know whether that company is still working there now?
A. I do not.

This does not seem to be as much to the point as I supposed it to be. I will read from Garth's testimony, on pages 127 and 128:

When we adjourned—

He was recalled—

Q. When we adjourned I believe I had asked you whether you took back with you from Mexico to New York any specimens of the ores of those mines?
A. I have been thinking about that since you asked that question. It has been brought to my mind, and I remember now that I did. I remember it, too, particularly, from having read over Col. De Lagnel's testimony, in which he says he saw a specimen in my office; and I now remember that we did probably bring back specimens from all the mines; at least I did.
Q. Were they rich specimens?
A. Yes; supposed to be.
Q. Who selected them?
A. Well, I don't know precisely; we all probably had a hand in it—Mr. Bartholow and myself and Mr. Griffith and Mr. Weidner and whoever were there. We were all together there, and while I was not an expert myself, I suppose that I may have suggested that such a piece was a rich piece. I do not remember that, though.
Q. Did you have any of these specimens analyzed at the mines?
A. I think we had; that is, pounded up and analyzed.
Q. Do you recollect what the yield was?
A. No, not particularly; but they were rich.
Q. Did you see those individual specimens collected yourself, or did you just rely upon their being selected by others?
A. Well, I saw them selected myself.
Q. How many of them came out of the La Abra opening?
A. Probably half a dozen of the old mine at least. We selected them at various places up and down.
Q. Out of these places where the columns had been robbed out of the mine?
A. Yes, sir.

It will be remembered the mine had been worked out once and these columns had been left standing, and now he says these specimens were taken out of the base of the columns, evidently the columns left when the orignal rich vein was worked out.

Q. Do you recollect how many came out of either of the other mines?
A. I do not. As to the exact number I don't remember.
Q. Well, your impression was that that was a very rich mine, was it not?
A. That was my impression. It was so stated to me, and I supposed so.
Q. Had you bought any machinery for the mines before you went to Mexico?
A. No, sir.
Q. Where did you buy that machinery?
A. It was bought in San Francisco.

I read now from De Lagnel's testimony on page 29 of the report:

Q. You were telling about the improvements that were being made; briefly, what was the character of those improvements, they had the mill you state?
A. The mill house and mining. They were putting up a new building, a long new building, as long as the old one, some 20 feet to the east of it, and one story adobe walls with a tiled roof. That was designed for offices and storehouses, as the place was very contracted.

Q. What was there previous to the erection of those works?
A. There had been the old Spanish machinery for the reduction of silver ore on the patio and the buildings adjacent.
Q. A full equipment for that character of reduction?
A. I presume it had been full; it was broken when I arrived.
Q. Had that been removed to give place to this machinery, or was it being removed; what was the fact as to that?
A. The old wall of the wheel pit had entirely disappeared, and the new wall, I presume, had replaced it, or nearly so. There may have been a slight change of location.
Q. Then do I understand they were substituting a new method of working for the old method?
A. When I arrived they were building a mill house and erecting machinery which had been brought from San Francisco—a new American mill—a ten-stamp mill.
Q. Would those improvements have for its object the old methods of the reduction of the ore, or upon the new American plan?
A. It was reducing the ore according to the American plan.
Q. Different from that which had heretofore been?
A. It was, as I understand it, the same thing only by different means. The American machinery was designed to work a greater quantity in a less time.

I also read from a letter from Gen. Bartholow, who was the first superintendent of the mines, to the parties in New York.

I read from page 240. I will not read much of this, but enough to show in a general way how expensive their operations were:

After I had gotten all our machinery completed in San Francisco, and the belting, bolts, extras, and tools shipped and paid for, I found that instead of having between 30 and 40 tons, which you had estimated the mill would weigh, I found I had nearly 80 tons, and instead of all costing $10,500, as you had estimated it, and me also in my report to the company, I found that—

The entire cost was	$15,500
The freight and duties	2,500
And the packing to Tayoltita, in consequence of the operations of Corona around Mazatlan, will average $16 to $18 a carga, or	9,000
The lumber and timbers will probably cost	4,000
Lime will also have to be increased to	1,200
Mechanics and laborers, I think, will be about former estimate	7,000
Corn, salt, quicksilver, and other supplies	10,000
Castillo, for balance of account	7,000
	56,200

This is a letter from Gen. Bartholow to D. J. Garth, dated February 6, 1866. I now desire to call attention to the result of the milling of the ores, and I refer to De Lagnel's testimony, pages 39, 40, 59, 60, 61, and 64, and Exall's, on page 309:

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. You will please state the progress, during your superintendency, in mining ores, the character of the vein, and the value or quantity of ore extracted.

A. It is impossible for me to give specific distances or amounts; I have no means of knowing from my memory. I understood the ores were sulphurets of silver, containing a certain amount of gold. I speak now referring particularly to La Luz.

Q. You mention the La Luz, but there were a number of mines?

A. The question embraced a number of mines, but I now speak of La Luz particularly.

Q. Give the character of the veins you refer to, La Luz especially, as you found out by working the ores in extraction from time to time.

A. To the best of my recollection the quartz veins were about 6 feet wide; no fixed width, the width being irregular at times, but the general vein would be, I suppose, about 6 feet wide.

Q. What was the character of the veins; were they regular and uniform, or did they increase and decrease as the work progressed?

A. I can only say that at times it was decreasing, and it was increasing at other times. You are speaking now of the vein, or the appearance of the silver in the vein?

Q. Give us as to both. I want to get from you a general idea of the character of the veins.

A. The character of the vein was quartz; it was a quartz vein, as well as I recollect, between solid walls. The width of that vein varied at times, and the amount of ore observable differed greatly from time to time. I have seen it as much as 2 feet wide; it was a dark matter, but I took it for granted from what the head miner said that there was silver there. I have seen it at times pinch out or taper out to mere threads.

Q. When it tapered out to mere threads, as you say, are we to infer that you extracted very little silver?

A. Of course so, sir. There was nothing but the dead rock that came away from the blasting in endeavoring to reach the vein.

By Senator BROWN:

Q. Is not that very common in all sorts of mining?

A. I believe so, but I have not had experience enough to answer with certainty as to all kinds of mining; I have heard of it.

Q. You will find it in gold mining, what they call a fall, where it will squeeze out to almost nothing, and then get very much larger.

A. I will observe that in this very mine—I think it is in this mine—there is one point where it is nearly double the width of an ordinary vein; they call it a chimney, if I recollect; it took up some distance, where they scooped this out overhead.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. You speak of the La Luz mine especially; why do you do that?

A. Because my main work was in that, coupled with the Cristo, and it was the principal mine worked when I arrived there.

Q. And was so during your superintendency?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you arrived at the mine, state what quantity of ore, or whether there was any quantity of ore already extracted.

A. When Gen. Bartholow left and I took charge there was a large amount of ore, how much I can not say, piled up on the old patio, and there was another pile from another mine a short distance off, and placed by itself. The amount in these several piles I can not state positively, because I do not remember.

Q. What representations did you receive upon your arrival as to the value of that ore extracted?

A. The estimate placed upon it was high, undoubtedly.

Mr. WILSON. Does the committee allow that kind of testimony, representations that somebody made to him as to the quality of that ore?

Mr. FOSTER. I will confine the question more accurately to his predecessors or other employés of the company.

Mr. WILSON. I object to any such interrogatories.

That is not particular.

A previous question was repeated here, and there was a long discussion between counsel. I will only read the answer.

The WITNESS. My conclusions were, first, that the company had been unfortunate in the selection of myself; that it required a more practical and skilled man to take charge of their mine; next, that the prospects before me when I left were adverse to the interests of the company, from the best light in my possession; that the first need was to send skilled and experienced men, and I had previously asked, I think, in a private letter to Mr. Garth, to come himself or send some one directly interested in the work to look at the condition of affairs in general. That was long anterior.

Q. (By Mr. FOSTER.) Upon what did you base your conclusions?

A. Upon the information, if I may call it so, that had come to me in various ways, and the representations made by the minors from time to time, as to the condition of the mines. I also based it upon the assays, limited as they were, that were last made, the first ones having been satisfactory, and from the small yield that we got from the little, comparatively, that I had run through the mill, some 8 or 10 tons.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. What did you tell Mr. Collins?

Mr. Collins was the gentleman who came on to the hacienda while Col. De Lagnel was in charge.

A. I told Mr. Collins exactly what I had told Mr. Garth. He questioned me; he wanted to know what was there; about the building; how much there was; how much had been done; its condition; about the mines, etc. I told him everything I knew. He then asked me what I thought. I told him what I thought.

Q. What did you tell him?

A. I told him this: "Mr. Collins, while I have not succeeded, or success has not so far attended us in developing the mines, in bringing out wealth, and while the appearance of things is disastrous, I do not pretend to tell you, for I have not that knowledge that would justify me in telling you, that these mines are not good." I said, "I can not do that."

Q. What did you say as to the appearances? I understood you to say that the appearances were disastrous. Did you use such a term?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg pardon. Go on.

Now Mr. De Lagnel is questioned about what he told Mr. Garth on his return.

What did he say—

That is, Garth—

as to the financial condition of the company at that time?

A. He told me that he had made every effort; that my drafts upon him had embarrassed him excessively; that he had told me not to draw except seldom, as I have told you. I told him then that when the limit was reached which he had determined not to pass he should caution the Bank of California to not meet the drafts. But he said that believing that the call was honestly made, and that the necessity existed, he had made the effort to meet it, and that he believed that I had only drawn when I honestly believed that it was a question whether the thing should come to a standstill at once and end the affair for the company and break their reputation, or whether it was to be continued, hoping that future management and development might give them the evidence of a better state of things.

I quote on page 308 from one of Exall's letters. This letter is to Mr. Garth, and is dated August 5, 1867:

The mill is now running on the same ore as I last worked. This run will finish it, and what ore to work then I know not. There is, of course, some little good ore in the great heaps on the patio, but it will have to be closely assorted, and the greater portion requires roasting, which is a slow operation and costly. I will at any rate do my best. I am now working 23 men by cargo; pay them not over $1 per week in cash. I must give them some little money. These are working in the Arryan and on the dump of the Rosario. The Cristo is now idle; also La Luz and Abra. I can get no metal from them which will pay.

The Cristo and La Luz, which have been worked for over a year, I am privileged to stop for four months.

That is, under the Mexican law.

The Abra I must work; will put in some men; see what can be found. No further prorogues will be given, and although I have no fear of any one denouncing the mines—

That does not sound very much like they have been taking ore from them—

I must not leave them unprotected. The ore which is now being gotten out will average per assays about $75 per ton, but it comes in small quantities. The returns I brought from mint I brought down to E., P. & Co., to settle money borrowed from them to buy goods; their bills will be due next month, and most of returns from present run will have to be paid them. I hope to be able to settle up all the indebtedness of the co., both here and at the mines. E., P. & Co. are the only ones I am owing here. Col. De L.'s draft was presented me here on yesterday. I told them I could do nothing. My draft, which I spoke of in my last, was returned. Please inform me what can or will be done. I can't see very far ahead in money matters; can count on nothing positive from the ores now on hand. I leave to-morrow for the mines. All have been frequently quite sick. I manage to keep up better than the rest. Hoping that this and my last together will give you the information you require,

I remain, respectfully,

CHARLES H. EXALL,
Acting Superintendent La Abra S. M. Co.

Here follows a statement of the run of the mill from the 27th day of May to the 13th of July, inclusive, May, June, and July, nearly two months:

Statement of run of mill from 27th May to 13th July, inclusive.

Amount of rock crushed, 89 tons 1,676 pounds, producing 131 marcos 5 ounces refined silver, yielding at mint	$1,672.29
Less mint expenses	146.47
Cost of chemicals	665.81
labor	380.54
wood, 95 varas, 62½	59.38

Leaving only, after deducting expenses, $420 for two months' work of the mill. Then he says in the same letter:

The yield from the 89 tons in statement is small and the time great, when we compare results, expenses, etc., but take into consideration that ore of ten times the value of this would require a no greater expenditure, no greater cost to work, etc. I am at present working same ore; will send a like statement at the end of the run, or when the ore is exhausted.

CHARLES H. EXALL.

Notwithstanding they have great piles of it on the patio, which will not pay for working.

I now quote again from the report:

The company in New York had assessed the stock to its full value and collected the assessments, and when the stockholders refused to pay further assessments it for a time resorted to loans. Finally its credit was exhausted, its drafts protested, a heavy judgment was obtained against it, and it became hopelessly bankrupt. All this occurred some months before the date of the alleged forced abandonment of the mines.

Mr. GEORGE. All that occurred when?

Mr. DOLPH. All this nonpayment of the draft, judgment against the company, failure to remit, and, as will be seen, urgent and repeated calls for money, had taken place before this alleged abandonment.

The treasurer of the company notified the last superintendent that the stockholders would pay no more assessments, that no more money could be borrowed, that the company could send no further aid, and that he (the superintendent) must depend entirely upon the mines for resources to pay the debts and expenses of the company and protect the property.

I read from Garth's testimony, pages 126 and 201. I will first read from page 201, thinking that that may be sufficient on the subject.

Q. Now, you said when the chairman asked you how much stock there was in the concern, you said about $150,000 or $160,000.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is that right?
A. Yes, sir; about that.
Q. And that was all paid up?
A. That was all paid up.
Q. Did you afterwards form a corporation, and if so, how—do you know now—an actual corporation under the laws of New York?
A. My recollection is that we had occasion to—we consulted Briton and Ely about it, and they looked at the paper and they said it was not a regular thing. "You will have to do differently: you will have to apply to New York and organize a regular corporation; this is nothing more than a kind of partnership affair," and this firm were employed to draw up the papers and get the company regularly incorporated under the State of New York, as I now remember.
Q. Now, did you see the articles of association or incorporation that were filed under the laws of New York; did you see that yourself so that you can tell what was in it?—A. Yes, I think so. It was under the ordinary act.

Passing over portions of the testimony, I read:

Q. How much was the capital stock in that concern?—A. In that concern at that time $300,000, according to my best recollection.
Q. Was that all paid up, or not?—A. I think not. I do not remember now of anything being paid up on the stock subscriptions than I have stated before.
Q. Do you think the stock subscriptions that were made to the corporation after it was organized were more or less than those we have gone over in detail that were subscribed before you made it a corporation?—A. I think it was the same. I do not think there was any increase. At that time it was not supposed that anything more was wanted.

The stockholders refused to pay any more loans and the drafts were protested. I read from page 318, 319, and 320 of the report. At page 318 I read from a letter of D. J. Garth, the treasurer, to Superintendent Exall, while at the mines:

DEAR SIR: Our last dates from Mexico, on the 5th February last, when we had a letter from Col. De Lagnel, at Mazatlan, informing us that some delay had been met with in getting the water on the wheel, and consequently in getting efficiently at work in washing the ore, but that it was not serious and he hoped in a few days to have everything all right, and gave us some ground to hope for good results now very soon. From a letter received by Mrs. De L. we expected that the colonel would have reached here before this time, as it was thought that he would leave Mazatlan about 10th March last, and we have been awaiting further advices with much anxiety and interest. We now expect by the next steamer, now nearly due, to see Col. De Lagnel or to hear something further from him or you. In our former letters we stated that in the event of his leaving Mexico we supposed that you would take charge of affairs, since when we have given no further instructions on this point.

Touching the management, we have so fully given our ideas in former communications that we now have nothing more to add. We trust the dead expenses of building and machinery and preparation for work have now been long since completed, and that a large amount of good ores accumulated ready for work, and that before this time have been beneficiated and the results proved to be satisfactory. I hope arrangements can be made to export the bullion, as it would be greatly to our interest to do so, instead of having to be compelled to have it coined, and so avoid loss and delay at the mints in Mexico. The affairs of the company here are much embarrassed; a few of the directors have advanced all the money to carry on the operations, and have been nearly ruined by it, and are not able to afford any further aid from here, and look anxiously to be reimbursed very soon from the products of the mines, and it is hoped that your best energies will be exerted to afford relief.

That shows the condition of the company May 10, 1867. There is another letter published on pages 318 and 319 relating to the former letter from which I have just quoted. Mr. Garth, the treasurer of the company, writing to Mr. Exall, says:

At that date we were advised that everything, after long delay, was about complete, and that we might soon look for good results from the enterprise, but that the supplies being exhausted, it was found absolutely necessary to draw on us for $7,500. This draft arrived on 2d April last, and was paid by one of the directors of the company, as it was considered that it was surely the last that would be needed, and we expected to return the money by an early remittance of bullion from Mexico. You can judge of our surprise and chagrin, when the last steamer arrived, instead of bringing Col. De L. with some fruits of our works, a draft for $5,000, gold, was presented for payment by Lees & Waller, drawn by De Langel, favor Bank California, and dated 10th April last, and of which we had not received any notice or advice whatever, and have not yet received any. As I had so often and fully advised the superintendent of the condition of affairs here and requested him not to draw further, I was much surprised that he did so, and that without giving any notice or reason for so doing. As it was found impossible to raise the means to pay this draft, it was protested and returned unpaid, and you must make some provision for its payment when it gets back.

This is from Garth to the superintendent.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the date?

Mr. DOLPH. It is a protested draft on the company which was sent back, and the treasurer writes to Mr. Exall at the mine that he must make provision to pay it there.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. DOLPH. It is dated New York, May 20, 1867, nearly a year before this alleged interference by the Mexican authorities.

I do trust that before that date you will have plenty of means to do so. I would now again repeat that I have made every effort possible to raise money here and have failed, and I have advanced all I can possibly do, and the other directors have done the same; the stockholders will do nothing, and it is probable the company will have to be sold out and reorganized. I must again urge you to use all possible dispatch in remitting us bullion, and use the greatest possible economy in working. We wish you to give us very full and particular accounts of amount of ore on hand and amount you raise daily; the number of hands employed, cost, etc., and amount crushed, yield, etc., and the cost of beneficiating, and also a regular monthly statement of receipts and expenses.

Then there is another letter, dated May 30, 1867, to Charles H. Exall, at the mine:

DEAR SIR: We wrote you on 20th instant, informing you that we had nothing from you or Col. De Lagnel, but that a draft drawn by Col. De L. from Mazatlan, 10th April last, had been presented, and there being no funds on hand, and no means here of meeting it, that it was protested and returned not paid. It is hoped by the time it gets back you will be prepared to meet it. Since my last letter Col. De Lagnel has arrived and made known to us something of the state of things with you. I must confess that we are amazed at the results.

Mr. GEORGE. Whose letter is that?

Mr. DOLPH. This is Mr. Garth's letter to Mr. Exall, the superintendent of the company at the mine.

It seems to me incredible that every one should have been so deceived in regard to the value of the ore, and I can but still hope that the true process of extracting the silver has not been pursued, and that before this time better results have been attained. Mr. De Lagnel expected that Mr. Sundel, of St. Dimas, would come to your aid soon after he left, and as this gentleman was said to be a practical chemist and metallurgist he hoped some means would be discovered to get at the silver. If, however, the ores are indeed worthless I don't see that any process of working will be of avail, and have the worst fears that our enterprise will, after all, be fruitless of good.

Bear in mind that this letter was written on the 30th of May, 1867, by the treasurer of the company in New York to the superintendent of the company at the mine.

In regard to the working of the ore, I would advise that you don't waste it by running it through the mill when you find that the yield is not satisfactory. I would suggest that you run say 2 or 3 tons of metal through the mill and see what the results are by the pan process, and then take a like amount of same sort of metal and crush it and grind as fine as possible in the pans, and then take it to the "patio" and beneficiate it and carefully compare the results of the trials; this is what I urged long ago, and think it well to do at once. I would advise that very frequent assays be made of the ores as raised out of the mines, and take out nothing that will not certainly be rich enough to pay well for working.

All expenses must be cut down to the lowest point, and you and Mr. Cullins must try and bring this enterprise into paying condition if the thing is possible—at any rate, no further aid can be rendered from here, and what you need must come from the resources you now have. Neither must you run into debt; cut down expenses to amount you can realize from the mines. I can not yet say what can be done in the future; no meeting of the stockholders has been held, and nothing done to pay off the debts here, now pressing on the company. For the present, all I can say is that the whole matter is with you; take care of the interests and property of the company; don't get it involved in debt, and advise us fully of what you are doing.

Also on the same page is another letter, written July 10, 1867, to the superintendent of the mine.

Mr. GEORGE. From Garth?

Mr. DOLPH. From Garth. It is as follows:

DEAR SIR: I had this pleasure on 30th May and 10th June last, after the return of Col. De Lagnel, and we had learned something of the condition of affairs in Mexico. In these, as well as in preceding letters, you were fully advised of the condition of the company here: that there had been no funds in the treasury for a long time; that appeals had been made in vain for aid to the stockholders, and that the parties here who had made heavy advances to the company were anxious for its return, and refused to make any further payments; and that the draft for $5,000 drawn on me as treasurer by Col. De Lagnel, on 10th April last, had been protested and returned to California, and, we suppose, to parties in Mazatlan who advanced the money on it, and who would have to look to you for payment of same; and we expressed the hope that by that time you would have taken out sufficient money to meet it and all other expenses, and hoped soon to have a remittance of bullion from you to aid in payment of the large indebtedness here.

We have since received your letters of the 6th May, from the mines, and 17th May, from Mazatlan. We are also in receipt of the sample of bullion sent at same time by express, the value of which is not yet ascertained, having not yet been able to get it from the assay office, but hope to do so to-morrow. I fear, however, that it is worth but little more than what it cost to get it from the custom-house in Mazatlan and the expenses on it here. I am glad to hear that you are taking out rich metal and hope it will turn out valuable. It seems almost incredible that all parties should have been so mistaken in the value of the ore now on the "patio," and I don't see how it is that Mr. Cullins and Mr. Sloan, old and experienced miners as they are, as well as the old Mexican miners, should have been so deceived as to the value of the ore. If it so much resembles rich metal, I don't see how you can tell the good from the worthless except by actual fire assays.

You should make these very often, and not go on and get out large quantities of worthless ore at great expense, thinking all the time it was rich metal. You will see from all my letters that no further aid can be given you from here, and that you must rely upon the resources you now have, and which we think ought to be ample to pay off the debts and to sustain you in current expenses, which you should cut down to the lowest possible point. I can but think that in the vast quantities of ores now on the grounds of the hacienda there must be a considerable amount of rich metal, and which you should beneficiate as soon as possible, taking care not to throw away or waste any that would pay to work. Of course, you keep an accurate account of the cost, not only of raising and transporting of the ore to the mill, but of the cost of crushing it and converting into coin or bullion; and, as it is a matter of simple calculation, you can soon see if it will pay or if it is a losing business.

If it costs more than it comes to, the sooner we find it out the better, and the sooner we stop the better for all parties concerned. I have theretofore called your attention to this point, and wish you to give careful attention to it, and would request that you furnish us such full and detailed statements on this point that we can see for ourselves. Give us the full particulars of expenses, amount of ore raised and its value, and the results after beneficiating, etc. Be careful about leaks and expenses, cut off all that is possible, and watch very closely every department with that view.

Don't run into debt or get into difficulty with the authorities, if there are any such things existing, but at the same time be firm in maintaining your rights, and don't submit to imposition except by force, and then make a legal and formal protest as a citizen of the United States and as an American company duly organized and prosecuting a legitimate business under the protection of the law, and our rights will be protected by our Government.

That should be taken in connection with what I have shown here, that there was never any protest or any claim that the company had been interfered with at all by Mexico. Then there is another letter from D. J. Garth to Charles H. Exall, as follows:

DEAR SIR: The steamer is just starting, and I have only time to say that your letter of the 11th, by private hand, has been received, advising us that you had drawn on me for $3,000, gold. In former letters you will have learned the condition of things here, and that there is no money to pay same, and that former draft of De Lagnel has been returned unpaid, and that you were urged to try and get along with what resources you have. These letters, no doubt, reached you in time to prevent your drawing, as no draft has been presented, and we hope by this time there is no necessity for doing so. I have no time to-day to write more, but hope you are getting on well.

Then follows a letter dated August 10, 1867. Things grow worse and worse.

Mr. GEORGE. A letter from Garth?

Mr. DOLPH. A letter from Garth to Exall, dated August 10, 1867. I do not commence to read at the beginning of the letter:

We observe with deep regret and disappointment that you are making but little progress in beneficiating the ores now on the "patio," and that the yield had not improved. This is a severe blow to the enterprise, as we had expected long before this time that you would not only be in position to sustain yourself, but to remit us enough to pay off the large indebtedness here. We learn with deep regret that you are likely to become embarrassed in getting supplies for the rainy season. Long before this reaches you it will be seen that the draft of De Lagnel, drawn for $5,000, was protested and returned to Mexico, and that you must try and pay it, and it is well that you did succeed in negotiating the draft for $3,000 you proposed, as we could not have paid it, and you must manage to get along with what resources you have, as we can not give you any aid from here. I would advise you to try and beneficiate what ore you have on hand, etc.

Then here is a letter of October 10, 1867, from Garth to Exall:

DEAR SIR: Since ours of 30th September, we have yours of 5th August from Mazatlan, and note contents. We are deeply pained to find that you are not well, and that, and are still without favorable results in the enterprise from which we all had such high hopes of success. I am very sorry to say that it is not possible to aid you from here, and that you must rely entirely upon the resources of the mines and mill to keep you going and to relieve you of debts heretofore contracted. It is not possible for us to direct any particular course for you, but only to urge you to try and work along as wellas you can, cutting down expenses, and avoid embarrassing yourself with debts. The Bank of California has again sent Col. De Lagnel's draft here for collection, but it was not possible to pay same, and it will have to return to Mexico, and we do hope you will be able to make some satisfactory arrangement to pay it.

Here is a letter from Charles H. Exall, administrator of the La Abra, etc., Tayoltita, February 26, 1868, to Granger:

SIR: As circumstances are of such a nature as to compel me to leave for San Francisco, and probably for New York, to inquire into the intention of this company—

Mark! "to inquire into the intention of the company"—

I place in your hands the care and charge of the affairs of the La Abra S. M. Co., together with its property.

You are invested hereby with all power confided to me, of course acting in all your transactions with an eye to the interests of the company.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. DOLPH. It is dated the 26th day of February, 1868.

This will to you, should occasion require it, be ample evidence of the right possessed by you to act in their behalf.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES H. EXALL.

Mr. GEORGE. That is from Exall?

Mr. DOLPH. That is from Exall when he left. He went down to Mazatlan and did not leave there until after the 15th day of March, because there was a letter which I have already read from him to Granger written there on that date. Then he sailed from there on the steamer on his way to New York, as he says in the communication to Mr. Granger, to ascertain what the intentions of the company were in regard to carrying on the mine and to money.

Mr. GEORGE. Has Granger testified in relation to the alleged trespass on the mines?

Mr. DOLPH. No; I do not think Granger's testimony is in the case. Granger is dead. Granger's testimony is not in the case, but there is proof here to show that Granger was in possession; that he was there exercising ownership at least four years afterwards, in 1872.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any evidence that Granger made complaint to the company in New York of any trespass committed against him there?

Mr. DOLPH. No, there is no showing of that kind.

Mr. GEORGE. Are his letters copied in the letterpress book?

Mr. DOLPH. I do not think Granger communicated much with the company. There are some letters here from Exall to Granger, but I do not think we have any of Granger's letters. He did not communicate much with the company. I now read from the report:

Ten months before the final abandonment of the mines the company in New York had been informed by its agent at the mines of the poor quality of the ores—

This was apparent from the letters of Exall to Garth which I have read—and that it had been greatly deceived as to the value of the mines. Before the abandonment of the mines the superintendent wrote several letters to the treasurer and managing agent in New York, informing him that the ores would not pay to reduce, and that, unless money was sent from New York, he would be compelled to abandon the property. And, finally, after his urgent appeals for money had been refused, being without means to meet expenses and greatly embarrassed by the debts of the company, he voluntarily left the mines in charge of his assistant and went without molestation to New York to endeavor to secure aid from the directors of the company. A meeting of the directors was called, at which Exall made his report, after which the whole enterprise was abandoned and came to an end. The treasurer and managing director testified before the committee that there was at that time no intention to present a claim against Mexico.

Mr. GEORGE. There was no intention to do what?

Mr. DOLPH. There was no intention at that time of the abandonment of the mine When Exall made his report to the board there was no intention on the part of the company to make any claim against Mexico. I read from the testimony of De Lagnel, page 64 of the report. The following question was put to Mr. De Lagnel:

I want to know whether there was at any time a refusal on the part of the Mexican authorities, while you were there or before you went there, if it is within your knowledge, to extend the time of the working of this mine because they were not actually worked by the four men?

A. I do not recollect any occurrence of that sort.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. Now, returning to your interviews with Mr. Garth, what effect did your report have upon him?

A. I do not know what effect it had.

Q. How did he receive the report?

A. Mr. Garth appeared to me to be cast down; overwhelmed, I may say; disappointed.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think that is competent.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not competent.

Q. What did Mr. Garth say to you in his reply to you?

The CHAIRMAN. That will do.

A. He expressed the greatest regret and disappointment. He had evidently had the greatest faith in the presence of great wealth in the mines.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You stated the effect in your deposition, I suppose.

A. Yes, sir; whether, taking all the circumstances into consideration, he thought that it was due to the unfortunate combination of circumstances, lack of proper management, or what, I do not know. He did not express himself to me on that point. He was very kind, but he seemed to be staggered, and could not understand how it was that everybody could have been wrong after he had been told this and that, and only found it out at the last moment.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. What did he say as to the financial condition of the company at that time?

That is, what did Garth say to De Lagnel after his return to New York.

A. He told me that he had made every effort; that my drafts upon him had embarrassed him excessively; that he had told me not to draw except seldom, as I have told you. I told him then that when the limit was reached which he had determined not to pass he should caution the Bank of California to not meet the drafts. But he said that believing that the call was honestly made, and that the necessity existed, he had made the effort to meet it, and that he believed that I had only drawn when I honestly believed that it was a question whether the thing should come to a standstill at once and end the affair for the company and break their reputation, or whether it was to be continued, hoping that future management and development might give them the evidence of a better state of things.

I was about to quote from page 319 of the report, but I have already read that. It is a letter from Garth to Exall and I shall not reread it. On page 308 there is a letter from Exall to the company which I have already read. I quote now from the letter of Charles H. Exall to D. J. Garth, treasurer of the company, dated October 6, 1867.

Mr. GEORGE. Written from Mexico?

Mr. DOLPH. Written from Mexico. He says:

The $5,000 draft of De Lagnel's was sent to a house in this place to be collected, with instructions to seize the property in case it was not paid. It troubled me a great deal, and I had much difficulty in warding it off. The concern to whom the draft was sent showed me his instructions and also the original draft. Fortunately for the company there was a flaw in the draft; De Lagnel failed to sign his position as supt. La A. S. M. Co.; simply signed his name, making it an individual affair. This was the only thing that kept them from seizing the property. I told them they could do nothing with the property here, as the company were not obligated on the draft. I have exhausted all the ore that I had on hand that was worth working. That which I worked was very poor and the yield small. The La Luz, on the patio, won't pay to throw it in the river. I have had numerous assays made from all parts of each pile; the returns won't pay. Amparas are not now granted, and mines are to be held only by working.

I am compelled to keep men in mines which yield nothing, merely to hold them. This I can do no longer—as I have nothing to give the men for their labor, and must now take the chances and leave the mines unprotected.

This is dated October 6, 1867, the fall previous to the time when Exall actually went to New York—

You ask for boundaries of mines, hacienda, etc. On this point I can give you no information, as these matters are, of course, to be found in the original titles, and I have no papers in reference to it. Recently the Government has ordered that all holders and workers of mines must present to the authorities the title deeds of said mines. The prefect in San Dimas sent for the titles of the La Abra Company's mines. I informed him that they were in New York. He gave me four months to procure them.

Mexico was a very lenient Government toward this American company. He was given four months to get the title deeds from New York, to show their title in accordance with law.

One month of the time has passed. So you will please send immediately all the titles to the mines, or certified copies of them. They must be here in the specified time. By last steamer I sent you full statement of business of hacienda; the runnings, returns, and expenses of the mill, account of ores, etc. I neglected to add 40 tons of tierras, which were run through and have been in statement sent, but was overlooked. I am sorry not to be able to send you statements of the months since. On my return from Durango I stopped at the hacienda so short a time before starting for this point—that it was impossible for me to make it up in time for this mail.

This letter was written at Mazatlan—

By next steamer will send you full statements of past months. The returns from Durango were small. I turned it over to E. P. & Co., as I was owing them.

Now—

There are no difficulties about authorities, boundaries, or anything else concerning the mines and hacienda, provided there is money in hand, and money must be sent.

The words "money must" are underscored.

I hope I have urged this point sufficiently so that you may see fit to send me something to hold the mines. I should be sorry to see them lost on this account. Please telegraph me if you intend sending money. I fear that before I can get a reply to this that something may have occurred. Of course, Col. De Lagnel informed you the conditions and terms on which I took charge of affairs here, which was the same that he was getting, and if I had known at the time what difficulties I was going to have in procuring means to keep the concern in motion, I would have refused on any terms.

I am much in need of money, as I wish to use it here. I will, in a month or so, draw on you through Wells, Fargo & Co., San Francisco, for $1,500—please inform me by earliest opportunity that you will meet the draft.

My health is very bad, etc.

That, recollect, was on the 6th day of October, 1867. I have already read the letter from the treasurer, saying that nothing would be sent, and he must depend on his own resources. I call attention to this letter again, and I will reread that part of it:

There are no difficulties about authorities, boundaries, or anything else concerning the mines and hacienda, provided there is money in hand, and money must be sent.

Then here is a letter from Exall to the president of the mining deputation of the district of San Ignacio:

[Translation.]

Mr. ANTONIO ARMIENTO,
President of the Mining Deputation of the District of San Ignacio:

The undersigned, in charge of the American negotiation, entitled La Abra Silver Mining Company, being obliged to stop the works in some of the mines belonging to said negotiation till he can receive instructions from the company concerning the way of resuming the works and the necessary funds therefor. For these reasons I ask you, with all due respect, to be pleased to grant me an amparo for six months on the mines Anyan, including those of the Sauz and Talpa, all belonging to the said company, and located in the district of San Ignacio, in order that they may not be denounced as abandoned. And I protest to make that request justly and not in bad faith.

Not having the necessary stamped paper, this petition was written in common paper, but I protest to replace it whenever I can.

Your attentive and sincere servant,

CHARLES H. EXALL,
Acting Superintendent of La Abra S. M. Co.

TAYOLTITA, October 14, 1867.

That was written on the 14th of October, 1867.

Mr. GEORGE. Written to the Mexican authorities?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, asking the authorities to allow him to cease to work the mines for six months, in order that he could hear from the company and get funds. I read that in connection with the statement that there was no trouble on the part of the authorities. I also read from a letter written at Mazatlan, November 17, 1867, by this man Exall to D. J. Garth, the treasurer of the company.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 30th September is just in hand, and, contrary to my expectations, contains nothing of an encouraging nature. I expected, after having previously written so positively on reference to the critical state of affairs with me, that you would have sent me by this mail some means to relieve me from my embarrassing position. I have in former letters laid before you the difficulties under which I was laboring and begged that you would send me means, and was relying much on the present mail, expecting that some notice would have been taken of my urgent demands for assistance to protect the property belonging to the company. To add to my further embarrassment, Mr. Cullins, whose time expired on the 16th instant—since my leaving Tayolitta (I left there on the 10th for this point)—intends to commence suit in the courts here for his year's salary. I am endeavoring to get him to delay proceedings until the arrival of the next steamer (don't know as yet if I will succeed in getting him to delay), when I hope you will have seen the necessity of acting decidedly, and sending means to prosecute the works and pay off the debts of the company, or abandoning the enterprise at once.

Nothing can be done without a further expenditure of money. I am now doing little or nothing in the mines, and will, when I return, discharge the few men which are now at work in them. This I am compelled to do, as I have no money, and my stock is almost entirely exhausted, and I fear if money isn't very soon sent some of the mines will become open to denouncement.

In my last letter I mentioned the amount required for immediate demands, $3,000, which must be sent out. By next steamer Mr. Elder, Slone, and Cullins, if paid off, will sail for San Francisco; if not paid off, suit will be commenced, and as I have no means to defend the case, fear it will go against me. When these parties leave, the hacienda will be left almost entirely alone, there being only myself, Mr. Granger, who I am also owing, and I away much of the time.

That shows what became of the mine. He says when he goes home he will discharge the men he has employed for want of means to pay them, and there will be nobody left at the mine but himself and Granger. That was the case; and then he came away and left Granger in charge.

Mr. GEORGE. Was any remittance ever made after that time?

Mr. DOLPH. Not a dollar.

What you intend doing must be done promptly. Please send me Mr. Cullins's contract with you.

I also read a letter written December 18, 1867, by Exall to Garth.

Mr. Cullins, who I informed you in a former letter would leave, insisted upon doing so by this steamer. He demands a settlement, otherwise he will immediately commence suit, and had made preparations to do so. To keep the matter from the courts I was compelled to borrow money to pay him off. The balance due him, and the amount I had to borrow here was $1,492. He has troubled me a great deal—has been exceedingly unreasonable. On yesterday the agent of the Bank of California informed me that he received the draft by the last steamer (which arrived a few days ago), and would immediately commence legal proceedings, and sent the draft on to the courts here.

I am utterly unable to oppose them; first, I have no means, and, again, I am not your agent here, never having received a power of attorney from you, which will be necessary, for I can not act in these courts without it.

The mine had been turned over to him by De Lagnel when De Lagnel left.

The Bank of California—

Then follow some words which can not be made out—

The Bank of California —— and will do something to recover the amount of the draft before the amount is doubled by the expenses. For God's sake telegraph to and pay them. Matters of this nature once getting into the courts it takes large sums to oppose them. The first steps taken by the courts will be to send some one to the hacienda to see to and secure everything there. This will, of course, stop everything and make it impossible for me to protect your interest. For your own sake in the matter pay them before things go further.

That is, the Bank of California.

My position is extremely embarrassing, and I know not what to do, and will have to be guided entirely by circumstances. I will, of course, do everything in my power, and may have to act in a very cautious manner, and will probably act in a manner which may occasion censure. Now, all I ask of you is to judge my actions justly and consider my circumstances, and believe I am doing the best for your interests.

I am doing nothing at the mines, and have only one person left with me.

That must have been Granger.

Please attend to this matter promptly. I am writing very hurriedly as there is a war steamer just leaving for San Francisco which will arrive there some days prior to the regular mail. I leave for the mines in a few hours. Attend to this at once and telegraph me.

I remain, your obedient servant,

CHARLES H. EXALL.

I do not think it is necessary to pursue this branch of the case any further. I do not know that I have yet read the letter from Exall turning the mine over to Granger. I have now read enough to show that the claimants stopped work on these mines; that the ore they extracted failed to pay; that they could not get enough out of it to carry on the work; that the men had to be discharged; that the drafts were protested; that the company was bankrupt and refused to furnish any more money; and that everybody had been discharged and no one was left there but Exall and Granger, and afterwards Exall left and turned the mine over to Granger.

Granger stayed there several years nominally in charge of the mine even after the award had been obtained from the Mexican Government for turning these parties out of possession and robbing them of the mine, and he sold a part of the machinery to pay the amount owing him from the company. The mines were frequently denounced by Mexicans and worked and then abandoned and again denounced, and if anybody wants them at the present time he can go there and denounce them.

Mr. FRYE. And all the ore got out was unused and utterly worthless.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, all the ore got out at great expense was utterly worthless although this same company claimed before the Mixed Commission that the mines would yield $1,000,000 a year and that the ore on the patio at the time was worth a million dollars in cash.

Mr. SAWYER. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me to move an executive session?

Mr. DOLPH. I will yield. I shall have the floor when the bill is resumed again, but I wish to state now that if the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] or the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] should be here on Monday and desire to discuss the bill I shall be glad to give way and conclude my remarks after they have spoken.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 25, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to ask unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas, and that the bill be taken up for present consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 533 of the Revised Statutes as provide that Montgomery County shall be embraced in the western judicial district of Arkansas be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the said county is hereby added to and placed in the eastern judicial district of said State, and all process issued against defendants residing therein shall be returned to Little Rock until otherwise provided, and all causes of action which have accrued or may hereafter accrue in said county, of which the courts of the United States have jurisdiction, shall be cognizable in the courts of Little Rock until otherwise provided by law.

That all actions or proceedings now pending against parties residing in said Montgomery County in the court of said western district may, upon the application of either, be transferred to the court for the eastern district at Little Rock, and in case of such transfer all papers and files therein, with copies of all record entries, shall be transferred to the office of the clerk of such court, and proceed in all respects as though originally commenced in said court at Little Rock.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the Committee on the Judiciary make no objection to that request, and I feel authorized to say that the committee would unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSENGER TO THE COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I present a report from the Committee on Accounts, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to appoint, for a period of five months, a messenger to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, at a salary of $75 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

REPORT.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, submitted by Mr. BLANCHARD on January 11, 1892, respectfully report:

That the public business intrusted to the consideration of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors embraces numerous and important matters, and, owing to the fact that the House has given the above-named committee power to sit during the sessions of the House, it is absolutely impossible to carry on the work of that committee without the assistance of a messenger. Your committee therefore report said resolution, with the recommendation that the same be amended by striking out the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "three," and that as amended the resolution be adopted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has the permission of the House to sit during the sessions of the House. The committee meets every day at 10:30, and holds steadily on, even while the House is in session. We have a most important and arduous duty to perform. The labors of the committee are simply enormous. There is no committee in this House that has more to do. River and harbor bills usually aggregate about $20,000,000 for expenditure during two years, and it requires a vast deal of time and work to properly prepare the bill, examine voluminous reports, give hearings, etc. We have no assistant clerk for the committee, and we want none; but we do need a young man to sit at the door of the committee room while we are in executive session.

The committee room is just across the corridor from the Hall of the House. Its convenience to the Hall of the House is so great that members, without knowing the committee is in session, come to the door with friends who have sent for them, seeking to use the room as a convenient place for conference. Besides, the hall between the committee room and the House, while the latter is in session, is always full of people, not members, who attend upon the sessions of the House. Unless the door is guarded they frequently attempt entrance to the great annoyance of the members of the committee and the disturbance of the work. The Doorkeeper details a messenger to sit at the door of the room until a quarter before 12 o'clock. At that hour it is his duty to go to that one of the main doors of the House to which he is assigned when the House is in session. Therefore, at the time when we most need a man at the door (when the House is about to meet and when the House is in session) we have none.

In view of that, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors passed a resolution requesting the House to grant the committee a messenger for the period of three months. By that time the river and harbor bill will be completed. We will not need his services any longer, and do not ask for the messenger beyond that period. For the three months we require the messenger the salary proposed is $75 per month, or an aggregate expenditure of $225. That is the resolution which has been reported favorably from the Committee on Accounts. I ask the House to agree to its passage.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. COOPER. I also present the following report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That an assistant clerk be allowed to the Committee on Military Affairs during the present session of Congress, at a compensation of $6 per day, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

REPORT.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, submitted by Mr. OUTHWAITE on January 15, 1892, respectfully report that they have given the matter careful consideration, and find that the large amount of public business requiring the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs is of such a nature as to imperatively require, during the present session of Congress (as the committee had during the last), the services of an assistant clerk. They therefore report said resolution favorably and recommend its passage.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. COOPER. I also submit another report from the Committee on Accounts:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be authorized during the sessions, until further ordered by the House, to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day."

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, submitted by Mr. BUNN on January 11, 1892, respectfully report that the business of the Committee on Claims requires, as it has in previous Congresses, the employment of an assistant clerk.

They therefore report said resolution, with the recommendation that the same be amended by striking therefrom the word "sessions" and inserting in place thereof the word "session;" and that as amended the resolution be adopted.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, bills of the following titles were severally introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the several committees named below:

PUBLIC BUILDING, COLUMBUS, IND.

By Mr. COOPER: A bill (H. R. 4417) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and other Government offices at the city of Columbus, in the State of Indiana—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT NEW ORLEANS, LA.

By Mr. LAGAN: A bill (H. R. 4418) for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or above New Orleans, La.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

MINE DISASTER AT KREBS, IND. T.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 67) to authorize the investigation of the cause or causes of the recent disastrous explosion and loss of life in a coal mine at the town of Krebs, Ind. T.

Whereas the people of the United States have reason for deep and abiding grief in view of the sad disaster which occurred on January 7 last past in a coal mine at Krebs, Ind. T., causing the death or maiming of from one hundred to two hundred men and the destruction of valuable property: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission of three competent men to proceed to the locality of the disaster for the purpose of thoroughly investigating and reporting the cause or causes and results of the sad calamity, with practical suggestions for the prevention of similar explosions in the future. The said commission shall be composed of one member from the Department of Labor, one member from the Geological Survey, and one civilian not in the employ of the Government; the same to have power to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths. For the purpose herein set forth there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum not to exceed $5,000.

During the reading of the joint resolution

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The Chair will ask the gentleman if he desires to introduce this joint resolution for reference.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; I would like to have it considered immediately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman under the impression that he asked to introduce it for reference; but the Clerk will report the joint resolution, and the House can do as it chooses with it.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BYNUM and others objected.

Mr. DINGLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to inquire if a single objection is sufficient to prevent the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read in view of the ruling made the other day by the present occupant of the Chair in regard to the Holman resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated to the gentleman that he had recognized him under the impression that it was for the purpose of introducing this joint resolution for reference only.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the joint resolution has been received and read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair at least intimated to the House that opportunity would be given to the House for objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to state——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine—and be candid enough to state to the gentleman from Kansas—that the Chair would not have recognized the gentleman if he had understood that it was to ask for immediate consideration. The Chair had declined to so recognize other members at this time to give an opportunity for the introduction and reference of bills which is not yet completed.

Mr. REED. But having recognized him?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As soon as the Chair ascertained that it was the wish of the gentleman to have the resolution considered he then stated that having been misled, not intentionally, by the gentleman from Kansas, he would give the House an opportunity to do as it chose with the resolution after the reading was finished.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to be heard for one word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman, under the circumstances, will not insist on the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. REED. The Chair rules, then, that the purpose being disclosed, on this information the Chair can retract recognition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the Chair has seen former occupants of the Chair withdraw recognition when it had been given on a statement which misled the Chair.

Mr. REED. And did it have the approval of the present occupant of the Chair? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon that the Chair has felt that no member could properly get recognition indirectly by misleading the Chair. The Chair thinks Mr. Speaker CARLISLE so held.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to see how the matter stood.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to give the fullest liberty on all questions, and will recognize the gentleman for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for immediate consideration if it is insisted upon, but does not intended thereby to rule that any gentleman can get the floor for consideration of measures by simply rising when the Chair is led to suppose that he seeks recognition only for the purpose of reference.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to read a paper in connection with the joint resolution which I sent up when I asked for its consideration. I do not wish to push or embarrass anybody; and I think that, on one minute's reflection, after the paper I have here is read, there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution. Can I have that time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is with the House.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say, that I hold in my hand dispatches dated January 8 and 9, setting forth that within territory of the United States, not within State lines, there was a terrible mine disaster by an explosion in which one hundred to two hundred men were killed and wounded. I brought this matter before the attention of the Commissioner of Labor, and he said that it ought to be investigated, but that he had no means to have it investigated. I went then to the Director of the Geological Survey, and he made the same reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend for a moment in order to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which concurrence was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of the report and appendices, No. 1944, of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, to accompany Senate bill 4827, to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," approved February 20, 1889, made to the Fifty-first Congress, of which 5,000 copies shall be for use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for use of the House of Representatives.

It also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 368) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Dover, in the State of New Hampshire;

A bill (S. 377) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of public building thereon at Grand Haven, in the State of Michigan;

A bill (S. 436) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Deadwood, in the State of South Dakota;

A bill (S. 534) to provide for the construction of a public building at Salem, Oregon;

A bill (S. 580) to provide a suitable site for a post-office in the city of Providence, R. I.;

A bill (S. 601) for the erection of a public building for a post-office and United States land office at the city of The Dalles, Oregon;

A bill (S. 687) for the erection of a public building at Stillwater, Minn.; and

A bill (S. 1206) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Fresno, in the State of California.

MINE DISASTER AT KREBS.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCREARY. I understood the gentleman now occupying the floor to send up a resolution, and after it was read the Chair asked if there was objection to the present consideration of that resolution, and objections were made. Now, I do not understand how it is before the House, as objections were made. If the resolution is held to be before the House, I wish to say that as a commission is authorized by the resolution, and as it seeks to appropriate $5,000, I think there are sufficient grounds for its being referred to a committee for consideration and for report to this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be in order if the gentleman from Kansas has finished his remarks.

Mr. MCCREARY. I therefore move its reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DAVIS. I will accept that course if I can submit with it this testimony in regard to it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey (to Mr. DAVIS). The gentleman from Kentucky can not take you off the floor to make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. If I can have this testimony go with the resolution I will accept that course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DAVIS. Can I have the testimony go with the resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can file the testimony without any order of the House or reading it here either. The gentleman from Kansas consents to its taking that course.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. He said he did, provided it take in the record.

Mr. DAVIS. Provided I can get the testimony put in. I would like to have the resolution and testimony go together when it is referred.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman couples his assent to its reference with the stipulation that he shall be allowed to put the evidence on record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not get the evidence on record.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. He can read it here in his own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has stated that he is willing that it should take that course. The Chair stated that it could be referred to a committee, and had recognized the gentleman from Kentucky to move its reference.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. But he also stated upon that provision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. OUTHWAITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS TO INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HARVEY] asks unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs for present consideration.

Mr. HARVEY. I ask that the resolution reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the allotments provided for in the agreement with the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians in Oklahoma, ratified by act of March 3, 1891, including the pay and expenses of the necessary special agents and the necessary resurveys; which sum shall be immediately available and be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose herein expressed.

Mr. HARVEY. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior which accompanies this report be read.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we shall have an opportunity of objecting to the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can raise the question of consideration at the proper time.

Mr. SAYERS. I simply desire to call the attention of the Chair to the point, so that the reading of the accompanying papers may not be considered as a waiver of any rights on our part.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, after the reading, will recognize the right of the gentleman to make any proper point.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, December 15, 1891.

SIR: The Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1891, ratifying the agreement with the Cheyennes and Arapahos in Oklahoma Territory, provided $15,000 for the expenses of allotments in severalty to them and for the necessary resurveys.

In accordance with this provision a corps of allotting agents were sent to the field in the summer, but the Indians refused to act until they received the per capita appropriated by the act, saying "they would travel but one road at a time;" thus much valuable time was lost and the appropriation expended in part without results. Of the 3,372 Indians of this reservation 1,808 have received allotments, leaving 1,564 yet to be provided for.

I have this day addressed a communication to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, asking the passage of a bill or joint resolution appropriating $15,000 to complete this work.

By the opening of this reservation some 3,000,000 acres of valuable land will be added to the public domain, equal to 18,750 homesteads of 160 acres each.

This matter is presented with request for favorable consideration, in order if possible to complete the work and open the lands to settlement in the early spring.

There are many families awaiting the opening of these additional lands and the people already settled in Oklahoma are greatly interested in this work being accomplished.

It would, in my judgment, greatly advance the public interest to have this appropriation made at an early day.

You will observe that it is recommended in the President's message.

Most respectfully,

JOHN W. NOBLE, Secretary.

Hon. S. W. PEEL,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the resolution, but simply to request that the gentleman in charge of it may give the House some information regarding the expenditure of the $15,000 already appropriated. According to my recollection it was estimated that $15,000 would be sufficient for this purpose. But now, as I understand, the $15,000 has been expended, and application is made for $15,000 more, coupled with the right to expend as much or as little of this sum as may be thought proper for the payment of the commissioners, employés, etc. I should like to hear from the gentleman in charge of this resolution an explanation as to why the $15,000 already appropriated was not sufficient and what has become of the money.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Oklahoma will also state the number of agents and whether they have been receiving their pay since the $15,000 was expended, or whether it is expected they will receive it out of this appropriation.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, the last Congress provided an appropriation of $15,000 to allot these lands to these Indians in accordance with the agreement made with them, and provision was made for a survey of the lands. At that time the fact was overlooked that the agreement providing that the Indians should have half their land as grazing land and half as agricultural land would necessitate double work on the part of the surveyors. The selections of agricultural land were made in the valleys of the rivers; the grazing lands were selected on the hills remote from the valleys. This double work consumed the appropriation more rapidly than was expected.

Another thing which operated against the speedy completion of this work was the fact that the Indians were for awhile obdurate and refused to take their allotments. They said they would travel one road at a time. The influence of the chiefs of the various bands was exerted to prevent their followers from accepting these allotments. I have on two occasions visited the allotting agents, and have seen them at their work. I believe they have been working as efficiently and industriously as it was possible for men to work.

Mr. SAYERS. How many agents have been employed for this purpose?

Mr. HARVEY. Seven agents were employed and each agent had a surveyor.

Mr. SAYERS. Then there were seven agents and seven surveyors?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. How many other employés were connected with this work?

Mr. HARVEY. The necessary employés in each surveying corps were employed; that is all.

Mr. SAYERS. Has the gentleman received any statement from the Interior Department as to the manner in which these expenditures have been made?

Mr. HARVEY. I have received no statement officially, but I know what they are, having examined them myself. The expenditures were for the pay of the allotting agents and surveyors and other necessary employés. In fact, this statement covers all of the expenditures that have been made, and $15,000 was manifestly insufficient to complete the work.

Mr. SAYERS. Was not that the estimate?

Mr. HARVEY. That was the estimate on former allotments, where no distinction had been made between the agricultural and the grazing lands. Since that distinction has been made the work has necessarily been doubled; and as a consequence the expenditure is larger than the original estimate.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman if this is unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. HARVEY. Unanimously.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand this report is from the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir; and made unanimously.

I will further say that, anticipating the opening of these lands, a very large number of people congregated along the border in the early fall, having no expectation that the appropriation would suddenly become exhausted, and believing the surveys would be completed in from four to six weeks. These people have been settled there and have been waiting all winter. They come from all of the States of the Union, from Texas, Kansas, and almost all of the States, and it is important that work should be resumed speedily in order to allow these people to go on the lands in the early spring—and it should be remembered that spring comes early in that latitude—and make their homes, so as to avail themselves of the planting season.

Mr. MILLER. What is the extent of the land?

Mr. HARVEY. About 4,000,000 of acres.

Mr. PEEL. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I desire to state to the House that I think it very important this resolution should pass at this time. As to whether the original $15,000 has been spent as it should have been spent, wisely and judiciously, or not, or as it might have been spent under other circumstances, is something that we can not now control. It is evident that the work is not completed; only about one-half of the allotments have been made, and the remainder of the work is necessarily suspended while waiting for funds. It can not go on until the money is appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Interior to meet the necessary expenditures required to continue and complete the work.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why has not the work been completed?

Mr. PEEL. I know of no reason other than that which has been stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma why the $15,000 appropriation of the last Congress did not complete the work; that is, that the allottees took one-half of their allotment in agricultural lands and one-half in grazing lands; and the work of making the allotment under the circumstances was considerably increased, augmenting the expense. It also required, necessarily, a longer time to do the work in that way.

This letter and the resolution accompanying it were sent to me at the first meeting of Congress by the Secretary, but as we had no committees then I thought it improper to press the matter at that time. It has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs, is unanimously reported, and I hope the House will take it up and pass it at this time and enable the work to be done promptly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas, before he takes his seat, why it is necessary to employ seven men to make the allotments instead of a smaller number? It is very obvious that the original appropriation of $15,000 was sufficient, and nothing has been said to-day to disclose to the contrary.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That would not prove it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This money has been spent by somebody, that I can see; but I want to know how it becomes necessary to employ that number of men?

Mr. PEEL. It is discretionary, I suppose, with the Secretary of the Interior. He is authorized to make the allotments, and if in his judgment seven could complete it more readily than three I suppose he felt authorized to employ that number.

Mr. HOLMAN. But why would it not be prudent on the part of the Committee on Indian Affairs to limit the number of persons to be employed? Why would not three be more profitably employed in the allotment than seven?

Mr. PEEL. We thought that the Secretary was a better judge of the work to be done and the mode of accomplishing it than the committee; and as all these things are referred to the Secretary of the Interior, the committee thought it better not to limit his discretion.

Mr. HARVEY. I can answer the question of the gentleman from Indiana. In reply to the inquiry, I would say that the reason it was necessary to employ so many agents was this: That these Indians live in detached bands, situated in different parts of this large area—quite remote from each other. It was necessary to divide the employés making these allotments, so that they could go to the different bands. It should be remembered that the lands were not taken in a body, but they were taken at distances of 40 or 50 miles apart. That is to say, that distance would intervene between one band and another; and it was necessary to employ an additional number of persons to enable the allotments to be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. But as a matter of fact most of them are located in two parts of that reservation.

Mr. HARVEY. No, sir; they are located in four parts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mostly in two.

Mr. HARVEY. Perhaps the greater number in two; but they are located in four colonies.

I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR].

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter to a large number of people in the Southwest, more important, perhaps, than many members may realize. The opening of these lands has been looked forward to in that region with the greatest interest for long years, and unless this resolution is passed to-day and the money given to the Department for the purpose of finishing the allotments to these Indians, it will put back the settlement for one crop season. The members of the House will remember that when the Creek country purchase, known as Oklahoma, was thrown open on April 22, 1889, it was then so late that in that climate the opportunity for making necessary improvements by breaking up the ground was almost precluded, and, as a result, little or no crop was raised that year. Hence, as to these lands lying still farther south, if anything, and farther west and in a drier climate, there is a greater necessity for their earlier opening.

It was the Committee on Territories that reported the bill opening Oklahoma, and we reported $15,000 in that bill for the opening of 1,800,000 acres. This tract of land has 4,000,000 acres, and in it are a vastly larger number of Indians to settle with and to allot. The Secretary of the Interior, in his communication which has just been read, tells us what the main reason was why this money has been exhausted. He states that for a full month, when all these allotting agents with their equipments were on hand, the Indians stood silent, stubborn, and obstinate, and would not have anything to do with the matter, would not come in and take their allotments or make any selections, and this reluctance on their part had to be overcome before anything could be done.

Mr. PICKLER. I will suggest that these Indians are distinctly "blanket Indians," and very little civilized.

Mr. MANSUR. By the way, I desire to say to the House that I visited this reservation during this last summer, and our soldiers at Fort Reno told me that the Cheyennes are the most distinctly warrior Indians left on the continent to-day; that they keep themselves farther away from white people, and have less to do with them than any others; that they are only to be seen when they come to the agencies for the purpose of drawing their annuities, and hence they are wholly wild and savage; and when it comes to allotment, you can not bring the same influences to bear upon them that you can bring to bear upon other Indians more civilized.

In this reservation of 4,000,000 acres there is twice as much land to be allotted for $15,000 as was allotted for the same amount in the case of the Creek lands in Oklahoma, namely, 1,800,000 acres; and I appeal to the House in behalf of the people of the Southwest who are looking for homes to allow this small appropriation to be made, and to allow this work to be done, so that the people there can have a chance to enter upon these lands in time to make a crop for this year. If that is not done by the first of April it will be too late.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to say, in addition to what my colleague has said, that this seems to be a very necessary and proper expenditure in view of the existing circumstances, and I hope the House will authorize it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I live on the southern border of Kansas, and it comes within my knowledge that there are a great many people who are very anxious for the opening of these Indian lands. I am getting letters every day from people in regard to it, and they are exceedingly desirous to have the lands opened. There is no doubt in my mind but that the committee whose business it was to allot that land have squandered the public money uselessly; but we are met with this difficulty: We have to finish the allotment, and there is no doubt in my mind that these gentlemen now realize that this great Democratic House, with its big majority and with its resolution passed in the interest of economy, will watch the proceedings hereafter; and that they will conduct the remainder of the business connected with the alloting of this land in the careful and prudent manner they should have pursued before. I am therefore in favor of the passage of the resolution to appropriate this amount of money. I will say further, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. SIMPSON. Not at this time, but I will yield later. I will say further, in explanation of the number of people who are seeking homes on the southern border of Kansas, that after having lived in Kansas under Republican rule in that State, under the "prosperity" that that rule has brought, they find that they have lost possession of their homes. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] They find that the protective-tariff policy, as pursued by the Republican party in this country, instead of bringing prosperity to them, has brought disaster [applause on the Democratic side]; and now they want to seek homes in a new land, so that they can commence life again under this Democratic administration, which I hope will repeal the McKinley bill and all kindred tariff bills and bring prosperity to the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now I am willing to yield to my friend for a question.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The gentleman has entirely forgotten about the third party watchdog. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I wanted to ask the gentleman from what fact or circumstance does he make the statement that this $15,000 previously appropriated has been squandered?

Mr. SIMPSON. I have this information from a committee who came up from that country and so reported to me.

Mr. PICKLER. What committee?

Mr. SIMPSON. A self-constituted committee of gentlemen——

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, I thought so.

Mr. SIMPSON. Nearly all of them Republicans. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That is very easily gotten around when the gentleman does not give names.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say to the House that it strikes me, in the interest of the public service, that the proper course to take, if this first $15,000 has been improperly used, is for the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department to investigate it and make report to the House. I would like to see that done if there is anything wrong about it. I only know from the official sources whence we get our information that the $15,000 is exhausted and the work is not completed.

Mr. SAYERS. That is a deficiency——

Mr. PEEL. That is a deficiency.

Mr. SAYERS. Brought over from the last Congress?

Mr. PEEL. Yes; and presented to us; in other words, in the language of Grover Cleveland, "it is not a theory but a condition that confronts us." Here we are in the middle of the stream, having part of the lands allotted and the remainder unallotted. A large surplus that we bought can not be opened for settlement until this allotment has been completed. It is now for the House to say whether this allotment ought to go on, in order to enable the Administration to open the remainder to settlement. That is all I care to say or can say about the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. PEEL. I do.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this measure; but it should be in the form of a bill, and not in that of a joint resolution. I think it should accordingly be amended in that respect.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. That this ought to be a bill instead of a joint resolution, The rules have heretofore been imperative that no appropriation of money shall be made except by a bill, although a joint resolution in other matters is equally effective with a bill. But the joint resolution can be amended in that way and made a bill.

Mr. PEEL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to add, however, that this measure does not belong to the Committee on Indian Affairs. This is a common deficit in appropriations. If it was not for the fact stated by the Secretary of the Interior, from which it seems to be urgent that this appropriation ought to be made, I think the original bill appropriation ought to have been sufficient; but the statement made by the Secretary of the Interior indicates that it is important that this appropriation shall be made. I apprehend, however, that the effect of this—not with the knowledge or consent of the Secretary of the Interior—will simply be in the interest of land speculators, who are there over the border. They will take possession, and the only effect of this prompt action, I apprehend, will be—not to put my judgment against that of the Secretary of the Interior—to benefit the men upon the border, who are largely speculators.

I say further, that it was found that the extraordinary haste in which the Oklahoma bill was carried through the House made it a measure for the benefit of speculators.

Mr. MANSUR. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANSUR. It took part of two terms—the whole of one term—to effect the passage of that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it was forced through with extraordinary activity and energy, as my friend remembers.

Mr. MANSUR. In three years?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, it was forced through with extraordinary energy from the beginning, and the effect was, as is very well known now all over the country, that the measure inured largely to the benefit of land speculators, and not for the benefit of bona fide settlers. I shall not object to this measure if it is made a bill, as it should be.

Mr. PEEL. I have no objection to its being made a bill, and the gentleman from Oklahoma has none. The resolution can be made as effective in the form of a bill.

Mr. HARVEY. I have no objection to its being made a bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Put it in the usual form of a bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the gentleman prepared his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Clerk can put it in the form of a bill instead of that of a joint resolution, inserting the regular enacting clause of a bill.

Mr. PEEL. Insert the enacting clause of a bill; that is all that is needed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma state the change he desires to make?

Mr. HARVEY. I desire to make no change except to put in the usual enacting clause at the head of that joint resolution and make it a bill instead of a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can forward to the desk the change he desires made.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a mere formal matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that this purports to be a joint resolution, which is offered as a substitute or instead of a bill that was introduced.

Mr. PEEL. That is true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill has not been sent forward, and it is that which should be considered. The Clerk will report the bill, and then such action can be taken as the House desires.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians in Oklahoma Territory, as authorized by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891: Provided, That the special agents to complete such allotments shall be citizens of said Territory.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution was submitted instead of the bill in order to avoid that latter clause in reference to agents being citizens of the Territory.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, I now move that all after the enacting clause of the bill be struck out and that the language of the joint resolution be inserted as an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the allotment provided for in the agreement with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians in Oklahoma, ratified by act approved March 3, 1891, including the pay and expenses of the necessary special agents and the necessary resurveys; which sum shall be immediately available, and be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose herein expressed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARVEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOAN OF FLAGS, ETC., FOR DECORATION.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to authorize the loan of certain ensigns, flags, and signal numbers for the purpose of decorating the streets and buildings of Washington on the occasion of the Grand Army Encampment, in September, 1892—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PURCHASE OF STURGEON BAY AND LAKE MICHIGAN SHIP CANAL.

By Mr. LYNCH: A bill (H. R. 4434) to provide for the purchase of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the majority of the Committee on Rules I present the report which I send to the desk, and which the committee recommend be adopted as the rules for the government of this House. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD. I will state for the information of the House that those portions of the report which embody amendments to the rules will be printed in italics, so that they can be easily distinguished. I may state further that the rules here reported are, in the main, the rules which prevailed in this House in the Fiftieth Congress, and that not more than two or three changes of any sort have been made. I think we had better pretermit all discussion of the report until it comes formally before the House, as it is the intention of the committee to ask the House to consider the rules on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Chair to state the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request of the gentleman was that the rules as reported be printed in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings.

Mr. McCREARY. I thought there was another request, namely, that the report be considered on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi to intimate that the committee desired to have the report considered on Monday next, but did not understand him to make such a request. Did the gentleman couple a request to that effect with his other request?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir; I made no request on the subject.

Mr. BURROWS. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] whether it would not be well to have these rules as reported printed in the shape of a document rather than in the RECORD, so that they could go to each member in a form convenient for reference.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The rules will necessarily be printed in document form also. All reports from committees, as I understand, are printed in that form, but I desire that this one shall be printed also in the RECORD, so that members may have an opportunity to examine the rules to-morrow morning.

Mr. BURROWS. If my friend will allow me, I suggest that there is no rule requiring the report to be printed in document form, and it seems to me that that form would be more convenient for members.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be printed in the RECORD and also in document form.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It was my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the report would be printed in document form also; but in the mean time it was the desire of the committee that its rules should be printed in the RECORD, so that members might have an opportunity to examine them to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Mississippi had better ask an order of the House to have the report printed in document form.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no rule authorizing the printing in document form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that leave was given to the Committee on Rules to have this matter printed.

Mr. BURROWS. If the committee intend to have the report printed in document form, that is all right.

Mr. CATCHINGS. To avoid all question, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 500 copies of the report be printed in the usual document form for the use of members.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] also requests that the rules be printed in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

5. If a member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

6. No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending, in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Upon every roll call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, in which case the name of the State shall be added; and if there be two such members from the same State the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair.

2. In the absence of a quorum, fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there is one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, and in all calls of the House the names of the members shall be called by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; the doors shall then be closed, and those for whom no sufficient excuse is made may, by order of a majority of those present, be sent for and arrested, wherever they may be found, by officers to be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms for that purpose, and their attendance secured; and the House shall determine upon what condition they shall be discharged.

Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise direct, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk to be entered upon the Journal as present.

RULE XVI.

ON MOTIONS, THEIR PRECEDENCE, ETC.

1. Every motion made to the House and entertained by the Speaker shall be reduced to writing on the demand of any member, and shall be entered on the Journal, with the name of the member making it, unless it is withdrawn the same day.

2. When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

3. When any motion or proposition is made, the question, Will the House now consider it? shall not be put unless demanded by a member.

4. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motion shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day at the same stage of the question.

5. A motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, a motion to adjourn, and to take a recess shall always be in order, and the hour at which the House adjourns shall be entered on the Journal.

6. On the demand of any member, before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it include propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain.

7. A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible, but a motion to strike out being lost shall neither preclude amendment nor motion to strike out and insert; and no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

8. Pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till the vote is taken on suspension.

9. At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

PREVIOUS QUESTION.

1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill to its engrossment and third reading, and then, on renewal and second of said motion, to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

2. A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the Speaker that a quorum is not present.

3. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question and pending such motion shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.

RULE XVIII.

RECONSIDERATION.

1. When a motion has been made and carried or lost it shall be in order for any member of the majority, on the same or succeeding day, to move for the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions except the consideration of a conference report, a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, or to take a recess, and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day without the consent of the House, and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration; Provided, That such motion, if made during the last six days of a session, shall be disposed of when made.

2. No bill, petition, memorial, or resolution referred to a committee, or reported therefrom for printing and recommitment, shall be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider; and all bills, petitions, memorials, or resolutions reported from a committee shall be accompanied by reports in writing, which shall be printed.

RULE XIX.

OF AMENDMENTS.

When a motion or proposition is under consideration, a motion to amend and a motion to amend that amendment shall be in order, and it shall also be in order to offer a further amendment by way of substitute, to which one amendment may be offered, but which shall not be voted on until the original matter is perfected, but either may be withdrawn before amendment or decision is had thereon.

RULE XX.

OF AMENDMENTS OF THE SENATE.

Any amendment of the Senate to any House bill shall be subject to the point of order that it shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if, originating in the House, it would be subject to that point.

RULE XXI.

ON BILLS.

1. Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings before its passage, which shall be as follows: The first and second readings by title on introduction for reference, or, being original bills, on reports from committees for commitment, except when the second reading in full shall be demanded by a member: Provided, That original bills on being reported by unanimous consent for present consideration, shall be read the first time in full; the second and third time by title, unless the third reading in full shall be demanded by a member.

2. Bills and joint resolutions on their passage shall be read the first time by title and the second time in full, when, if the previous question is ordered, the Speaker shall state the question to be: Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? And if decided in the affirmative, it shall be read the third time by title, unless the reading in full is demanded by a member, and the question shall then be put upon its passage.

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

4. All bills for improvement of rivers and harbors, for the establishment or change of post-routes, and all bills of a private nature, shall be delivered to the Clerk, as in the case of memorials and petitions, for reference to appropriate committees.

5. No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following-named committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and to the Committee on Accounts.

RULE XXII.

OF PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

1. Members having petitions or memorials or bills of a private nature to present may deliver them to the Clerk, indorsing their names and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and said petitions and memorials and bills of a private nature, except such as, in the judgment of the Speaker, are of an obscene or insulting character, shall be entered on the Journal with the names of the members presenting them, and the Clerk shall furnish a transcript of such entry to the Official Reporters of Debates for publication in the RECORD.

2. Any petition or memorial or private bill excluded under this rule shall be returned to the member from whom it was received; and petitions and private bills which have been inappropriately referred may, by direction of the committee having possession of the same, be properly referred in the manner originally presented; and an erroneous reference of a petition or private bill under this clause shall not confer jurisdiction upon the committee to consider or report the same.

RULE XXIII.

OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

1. In all cases, in forming a Committee of the Whole House, the Speaker shall leave his chair after appointing a Chairman to preside, who shall, in case of disturbance or disorderly conduct in the galleries or lobby, have power to cause the same to be cleared.

2. Whenever a Committee of the Whole House finds itself without a quorum, the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal; but if on such call a quorum shall appear, the committee shall thereupon resume its sitting without further order of the House.

3. All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

4. In Committees of the Whole House, business on their calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to passing over any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House.

5. When general debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to an amendment; and neither an amendment nor an amendment to an amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee.

6. The House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph to a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only (which motion shall be decided without debate); but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

7. A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House. But before the question of concurrence is submitted, it is in order to entertain a motion to refer the bill to any committee, with or without instructions, and when the same is again reported to the House it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole without debate.

8. The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committees of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable.

RULE XXIV.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

1. Each Monday morning during a session of Congress, immediately after the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting has been read and approved, the Speaker shall call all the States and Territories in alphabetical order for bills and resolutions for printing and reference without debate, on which call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures may be presented and appropriately referred, and on this call only resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order for reference to appropriate committees, which resolutions shall be reported to the House within one week thereafter.

2. After the Journal is read and approved each day, other than Monday, the Speaker shall lay before the House, for reference, messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and also such bills, resolutions, and other messages from the Senate as may have been received on previous days.

3. On all days other than Monday as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed, and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate, if requested in writing by the Member or Delegate; and the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in regular order and then upon the select committees; and if the whole of the hour is not consumed by this call, then it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of other business hereinafter provided; but if he shall not complete the call within the hour, he shall resume it in the succeeding morning hour where he left off.

4. The morning hour for the call of committees shall not be dispensed with except by a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting thereon.

5. After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day, on either the House or Union Calendar. And whenever any committee shall have occupied the said hour for one day, it shall not be in order for such committee to designate any other proposition for consideration until all the other committees shall have been called in their turn; and when any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call it shall thereafter remain on the Calendar as unfinished business and be taken up in its order: Provided, That when the hour herein prescribed shall expire while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is considering a bill, the said committee shall rise without motion therefor.

6. After the hour under the preceding clause shall have been occupied, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

7. Unfinished business, if any, having been disposed of, motions shall be in order as follows:

First. That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other business on its Calendar.

Second. To proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

RULE XXV.

PRIORITY OF BUSINESS.

All questions relating to the priority of business shall be decided by a majority without debate.

RULE XXVI.

PRIVATE AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

1. Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by the House.

2. The second and fourth Mondays in each month, after the call of States and Territories, shall, when claimed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee.

RULE XXVII.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

After six days from the commencement of a second or a subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports which originated in the House, and remained undetermined at the close of the last preceding session, shall be in order for action, and all business before committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress in the same manner as if no adjournment had taken place.

RULE XXVIII.

CHANGE OR SUSPENSION OF RULES.

1. No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, or one hour shall have been devoted thereto, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

2. All motions to suspend the rules shall, before being submitted to the House, be seconded by a majority by tellers, if demanded.

3. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

RULE XXIX.

CONFERENCE REPORTS.

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read, while the roll is being called, or the House is dividing on any proposition. And there shall accompany every such report a detailed statement sufficiently explicit to inform the House what effect such amendments or propositions will have upon the measures to which they relate.

RULE XXX.

SECRET SESSION.

Whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, or whenever the Speaker or any member shall inform the House that he has communications which he believes ought to be kept secret for the present, the House shall be cleared of all persons except the members and officers thereof, and so continue during the reading of such communications, the debates and proceedings thereon, unless otherwise ordered by the House.

DRAWING OF SEATS.

1. At the commencement of each Congress, immediately after the Members and Delegates are sworn in, the Clerk shall place in a box, prepared for that purpose, a number of small balls of marble or other material equal to the number of Members and Delegates, which balls shall be consecutively numbered and thoroughly intermingled, and at such hour as shall be fixed by the House for that purpose, by the hands of a page, draw said balls one by one from the box and announce the number as it is drawn, upon which announcement the Member or Delegate whose name on a numbered alphabetical list shall correspond with the number on the ball, shall advance and choose his seat for the term for which he is elected.

2. Before said drawing shall commence, each seat shall be vacated and so remain until selected under this rule, and any seat having been selected shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll is finished, and whenever the seats of Members and Delegates shall have been drawn, no proposition for a second drawing shall be in order during that Congress.

RULE XXXIII.

HALL OF THE HOUSE.

The Hall of the House shall be used only for the legislative business of the House, and for the caucus meetings of its members, except upon occasions where the House by resolution agree to take part in any ceremonies to be observed therein; and the Speaker shall not entertain a motion for the suspension of this rule.

RULE XXXIX.

These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses unless otherwise ordered.

RULE XLVI.

RECESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until 2 o'clock, for which hour a special order has been assigned.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) took a recess.

PRESENTATION OF PORTRAITS OF EX-SPEAKERS GROW AND RANDALL.

The recess having expired, the House was again called to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution which directs the order of proceedings for this hour.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That January 21, at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for the presentation to the House of Representatives of the portraits of ex-Speakers Grow and Randall by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and that upon the occasion the committees of the senate and house of representatives of that State be admitted to the floor.

[The portraits of the ex-Speakers named in the resolution (painted, under the direction of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, by W. A. Greaves, of Warren, Pa.) were placed in the area in front of the Clerk's desk.]

Hon. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, ex-Speaker, occupied a seat on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The officers of the House will admit the gentlemen who are entitled to the privileges of the floor under the resolution which has been read.

In pursuance of the resolution, the following-named officers and members of the Pennsylvania Legislature entered and took the seats assigned them:

Hon. J. P. S. Gobin, president pro tempore of the senate; Hon. C. C. Thompson, speaker of the house of representatives; Hon. D. B. McCreary, member of the senate; Hon. F. W. Hayes and Hon. J. H. Fow, members of the house of representatives.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, three citizens of Pennsylvania at different periods in our history have presided over the deliberations of this House.

Frederick A. Muhlenberg was Speaker of the First and Third Congresses.

Galusha A. Grow was elected Speaker of the Thirty-seventh Congress at its meeting in extra session on the 4th day of July, 1861, and presided over the subsequent sessions of that memorable Congress.

Samuel J. Randall came to the chair to fill a vacancy at the commencement of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress and was reëlected Speaker of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses.

The portrait of Speaker Muhlenberg, from an authentic painting in the possession of his descendants, was executed by an eminent artist and presented to this House several years ago by members of the Muhlenberg family and now adorns the walls of the corridor of this Hall, an acceptable and worthy memento of the distinguished Speaker of the First Congress. The more recent presentation to this House by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts of portraits of her illustrious sons, Speakers Varnum, Sedgwick, and Banks, served to attract attention to the fact that the other Speakers from Pennsylvania were inadequately and unworthily represented by inferior likenesses upon your walls; and at the meeting of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in January, 1891, Governor Beaver called attention to this matter in the following language:

The attention of the executive has lately been called to the fact, by persons deeply interested in the subject, that whilst the Speakers of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress from Massachusetts are represented in the corridors of its Hall by oil paintings presented to Congress by that ancient Commonwealth, the services of men equally worthy and distinguished who occupied the same place from Pennsylvania are perpetuated by cheap crayon portraits. We are too little disposed in Pennsylvania to recognize the merits and perpetuate the memory of men who have served with distinguished zeal and conspicuous ability in public place.

Two Representatives in Congress from Pennsylvania have in late years occupied the Speaker's chair—Galusha A. Grow and Samuel J. Randall. Their place in history, the distinguished part which they took in the councils of the nation, the conspicuous service rendered by them in the exalted position to which they were respectively called would seem to demand at our hands some special recognition. I respectfully recommend, therefore, that a reasonable appropriation be made for painting the portraits of these two gentlemen, to be presented to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States in a public manner, as a token of the pride and appreciation which the people of our Commonwealth have in the memory and the services of these distinguished men.

The Legislature of the State responded promptly to the governor's suggestion, and by act of April 29, 1891, provided as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a committee, consisting of the president pro tempore of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, and two members of the house of representatives and one member of the senate, shall be appointed by the speaker and president pro tempore thereof respectively, whose duty it shall be to select an artist who shall paint the portraits of Samuel J. Randall and Galusha A. Grow, formerly Speakers of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, and cause said portraits to be presented to the House of Representatives of the United States Congress in a public manner, as a token of the pride and appreciation which the people of this Commonwealth have in the memory and the services of these distinguished men.

The committee appointed under the provisions of this act consists of Hon. J. P. S. Gobin, president pro tempore of the senate; Hon. C. C. Thompson, speaker of the house of representatives; Gen. D. B. McCreary, from the senate, and Messrs. F. W. Hays and John H. Fow, of the house of representatives. This committee secured the services of W. A. Greaves, of Warren, Pa., and intrusted to him the work of painting the portraits of Messrs. Grow and Randall. Mr. Greaves was fortunate in securing the personal attendance in his studio of ex-Speaker Grow, and has thus been able to present from life a faithful portrait of him, but softened and silvered somewhat by the lapse of time since he occupied the chair of this House.

For the portrait of Mr. Randall the artist had as a guide only a photograph furnished by the family and the crayon portrait upon the wall of the corridor of the House, but he has sought to produce, and I believe with great success, a faithful portrait of Speaker Randall as he was when he occupied the chair of this House.

The committee of the Legislature of Pennsylvania are now present, and, upon your courtesy, upon the floor of the House. It is also a pleasant feature of this occasion that we have with us Mr. Grow, erect, alert, and vigorous, in the full enjoyment of the talents and powers which gave him eminence in this House.

And now, sir, for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and speaking in behalf of the committee of her Legislature here present, I present to the House of Representatives of the United States Congress these portraits of its former Speakers, Galusha A. Grow and Samuel J. Randall. They are tendered to you, in the apt language of the governor of Pennsylvania, "as a token of the pride and appreciation which the people of that Commonwealth have in the memory and services of these distinguished men," and in the hope that they will prove a fitting memorial of eminent services in the past, and an inspiration to patriotic efforts in the future.

Sir, the successful Speaker of this House must be recognized as a great man. Our peculiar parlimentary system concentrates in his hands vast powers and imposes great responsibilities. To execute the one justly and impartially and to meet the other efficiently and successfully requires talents and qualities, mental, moral, and physical, of no common grade. This is especially so in periods of general unrest, when the passions and prejudices of men are highly excited and their feelings and convictions are deeply aroused. It was at such periods that the sons of Pennsylvania occupied the chair of this House.

When the First Congress assembled the Government had hardly been formed. The Constitution had been but recently established. The chaos which succeeded the close of the Revolution was but slowly giving place to more orderly methods and more systematic government. That "more perfect union," which was a primary purpose of the formation of the Constitution, rested as yet but uneasily and insecurely upon the various elements united. The great question of the extent of the delegated powers of the General Government and the reserved rights of the States was a practical problem commanding attention of the best minds in the new Republic. To satisfactorily adjust its relations with the people and to put in practical running order this new Government for a new nation was the onerous task which confronted the First Congress. Among its members were many of the fathers of the Republic, and to be called upon to preside over that body and direct its deliberations, and so to discharge the duties of his office as to secure a subsequent reëlection, was a high tribute to the talents, abilities, and character of Pennsylvania's distinguished son, Frederick A. Muhlenberg.

Nearly three-quarters of a century later, when reason and argument had failed to settle the great question of the relative powers and rights of the General Government and of the individual States and the dread arbitrament of war had been invoked; when clouds hung dark and portentous over the nation's horizon, and men were asking themselves and asking each other, with fear and trembling, whether this nation must indeed go down in blood and ruin, President Lincoln summoned the Thirty-seventh Congress to meet in extraordinary session on the anniversary of the nation's birth. The men who answered that call came fresh from the people. They voiced the patriotic purpose and the firm determination that the Union should be preserved and the nation saved.

Among them was the great commoner Thaddeus Stevens, the venerable statesman John J. Crittenden, the dashing Logan and the stately Conkling, Washburne, Colfax, Lovejoy, VOORHEES, HOLMAN, Wilson, Windom, DAWES, MORRILL, Fenton, Kelley, Hickman, McPherson, Blair, Wheeler, Pendleton, Wickliffe, Cox, Maynard, and others no less able and distinguished; but of all that remarkable body of men who gathered in this Hall on that July morning not one remains still a member of this House except the venerable and distinguished gentleman from Indiana, Judge HOLMAN.

The House organized promptly. Without the formality of a caucus, and with no persistent opposition, Galusha A. Grow was elected Speaker on the first ballot. He had entered Congress ten years before, its youngest member. His persistent and unyielding championship of the homestead bill, his careful study of the great questions then agitating the country, his readiness of speech, his fertility of resource, his parliamentary knowledge, his courageous, and, I might say almost aggressive, defense of his personal rights and dignity, and of the deep convictions of the great, loyal North, specially designated him as the man to take the helm, and bravely and well he held it.

Samuel J. Randall entered the House when Grow left it. During the closing years of the war and the turbulent period of reconstruction he served with constantly increasing efficiency and prominence as a member of this body, and when the death of Speaker Kerr, in the fall of 1876, rendered a new election necessary, he naturally succeeded to the Speakership.

When he took the chair partisan feeling ran high. The result of the recent national election was still in dispute, and the contest continued during the entire winter, taking shape in the closing hours of the session in an effort to prevent the conclusion of the counting of the electoral vote. As descriptive of the conduct and bearing of Speaker Randall in that critical juncture I can not do better than quote from his own words when he offered the resolution in this House accepting the portraits of Sedgwick, Varnum, and Banks. Said he:

> Soon after I entered this House, now more than a quarter of a century ago, I came to consider that that office which you, sir, now temporarily hold was the highest office within the reach of an American citizen; that it was a grand official station, great in the honors which it conferred and still greater in the ability it gave to impress upon our history and legislation the stamp of truth, fairness, justice, and right. * * * When it fell to my fortune to occupy the Speaker's chair, I realized how true was my idea of the position and its possibilities; and I do not believe there is anyone worthy of being mentioned in connection with it who, the very instant he takes it, will not become so broad and generous in the scope of his political vision as to act regardless of individual and personal consequences and only for the best interests of the American people as his judgment shall dictate.

The Speaker of the House rose grandly above the fettering entanglements of partisan allegiance, and demonstrated that he had indeed "become so broad and generous in the scope of his political vision as to act regardless of individual and personal consequences and only for the best interests of the American people." The count proceeded to a close. The danger of violence, bloodshed, and anarchy passed by, and the country recognized the strong will and the stern virtue of Samuel J. Randall as a potent factor in preserving the nation's peace.

It has been my purpose, Mr. Speaker, thus briefly to simply call attention to the fact that the Speakers of this House from Pennsylvania have occupied the chair at turbulent and memorable epochs in our history, and have so carried themselves in their high office as to give that grand old Commonwealth just cause to cherish with pride the fact that they were her sons; and I leave to my colleagues, their successors on this floor, now representing the districts which honored them and which they more greatly honored, the grateful task of detailing more fully their services and delineating more completely their characters.

But, sir, I can not forbear from paying my tribute of reverent homage to one marked characteristic common to both. They were singularly pure, honest, and earnest in their convictions and conduct, and of unflinching courage in their allegiance to those convictions. Where the path of duty led, or where they thought it led, they trod, utterly regardless of difficulties or dangers.

And now, sir, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania tenders to you these faithful reproductions of the physical lineaments of her distinguished sons. Their services, their time, and their strength, their best qualities, and most earnest efforts of mind and heart she has freely given to the nation in the years that are past. The record of their services and achievements has gone into their country's history. Their examples and their characters, for emulation and inspiration, are and must remain a part of the nation's treasures. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is always less embarrassing to eulogize men who have passed away than those who are still among us, for the kindly veil that Death draws leaves visible only the bright spots in the lives of the departed.

We are too often called upon with saddened minds and hearts filled with grief to bear testimony to the virtues and graces of those who have left vacant places, and all angularities and asperities are softened and forgotten by the knowledge that they will walk among us no more.

But of those who are still living, who are still fighting the battle of life, and whose names may still be heard in the political arena, it requires a full measure of faith and confidence in their manhood, ability, and patriotism to proclaim them as worthy of the bright chaplet of fame without fear of its luster becoming dimmed.

Galusha A. Grow, whom we are here to-day to honor, was born in Ashford, Windham County, Conn., from which place he removed to Susquehanna County, Pa., in May, 1834, being at that time about ten years of age. In the spring of 1838 he entered Franklin Academy, at Harford, Pa., leaving there in 1840 to enter Amherst College, from which he graduated with high honors in 1844. In 1845 he began studying law with Hon. F. B. Streeter, of Montrose, Pa., and on April 19, 1847, was admitted to the bar of Susquehanna County.

In 1848 he became a law partner of Hon. David Wilmot, of Bradford County, Pa., and when, in 1850, Mr. Wilmot, the candidate of the Free-Soil branch, and James Lowery, the candidate of the Proslavery branch of the Democratic party, withdrew as candidates for Congress, Mr. Grow received the nomination from both branches of the party and was elected.

Thus Mr. Grow, over forty years ago, became a member of the Thirty-second Congress, and at once became prominent in its deliberations; and after ten years of honorable service on the floor of the House, the best proof of the high estimation in which he was held by his colleagues is the fact that they elected him to the third position in the land—Speaker of the House of Representatives.

In the ten years preceding his election as Speaker he served with distinction on the Committees on Indian Affairs, Agriculture, and Territories, being a member of the latter for six years and its chairman for four years.

In this decade many stirring questions disturbed the public mind. The repeal of the Missouri compromise, which caused Mr. Grow's withdrawal from the Democratic party, which had elected him; the Kansas troubles; the Lecompton bill; the homestead bill, and the Pacific railroad bills all agitated the political sea, and the experience of time has demonstrated the wisdom of the stand taken by him on all these important measures.

Early in his Congressional career he became an earnest advocate of the homestead bill, and as the name of Galusha A. Grow has been so indissolubly connected with that politic and excellent measure, it may not be out of place to give it a proper prominence in this connection.

Though the exact origin of the idea, afterwards exemplified in the homestead law, is somewhat obscure, it certainly was one of those measures which evolved itself from the will of the people, gathering in force slowly but surely until it overcame all opposition.

It was doubtless an outgrowth of that series of laws known as donation acts, a course of sporadic legislation extending from the year 1842 to 1850, the first bearing on donations of lands in Florida and the last referring to the new Territory of Oregon, the lands being given to induce settlers in distant and dangerous localities.

The enactment of these laws fostered the sentiment growing so rapidly in the public mind that "the public lands are a heritage of the people," that the question became a burning one, and was agitated at every political gathering and was the all-engrossing topic, until it assumed national importance as the great issue to be determined at the polls, by the action of the national convention of the Free Soil Democracy at Pittsburg in 1852, when the popular sentiment assumed definite shape in the declaration of principles adopted, the twelfth resolution of which reads as follows:

That the public lands of the United States belong to the people and should not be sold to individuals nor granted to corporations, but should be held as a sacred trust for the benefit of the people, and should be granted in limited quantities, free of cost, to landless settlers.

I believe the first bill presented to Congress granting small tracts of Government lands free to actual settlers was introduced in the Thirty-first Congress by Horace Greeley, and although no action was taken on his bill, yet he continued advocating the measure in the editorial columns of the New York Tribune until the proposition became enacted into a law of the land.

From the time he entered the Thirty-second Congress until the final passage of the law and signature by President Lincoln on May 20, 1862, Mr. Grow was an earnest advocate of a free homestead law, and his voice was often heard, and his energies always directed, in favor of its success.

His speeches upon this measure, delivered at different times during the many years it was under discussion, were, I believe, the most forcible and convincing of any made in its favor before Congress, and the following quotations therefrom will show the broad scope of his argument, and at the same time call to mind sentiments the beauty and wisdom whereof is only emphasized by experiences of time. In the Thirty-second Congress he says:

The fundamental rights of man may be summed up in two words—life and happiness. The first is the gift of the Creator, and may be bestowed at His pleasure; but it is not consistent with His character for benevolence that it should be bestowed for any other purpose than to be enjoyed, and that we call happiness. Therefore, whatever nature has provided for preserving the one or promoting the other belongs alike to the whole race. And as the means for sustaining life are derived almost entirely from the soil, every person has a right to so much of the earth's surface as is necessary for his support.

Again, in a speech on the homestead bill in the Thirty-third Congress, he says:

The prosperity of States depends not on the mass of wealth, but in its distribution. That country is greatest and most glorious in which there is the greatest number of happy firesides.

And still again in a speech delivered in the Thirty-sixth Congress, in favor of the homestead bill, introduced by himself, he says:

National disasters are not the growth of a day, but the fruit of long years of injustice and wrong. The seeds planted by false, pernicious legislation often require ages to germinate and ripen into their harvests of ruin and death. The most pernicious of all the baneful seeds of national existence is a policy that degrades labor.

This bill, introduced by Mr. Grow in the Thirty-sixth Congress, was reported on March 6, 1860, by Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, from the Committee on Public Lands, and on March 12, 1860, it passed the House by a vote of 119 yeas to 95 nays, but was rejected by the Senate and a substitute offered by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, granting homesteads to actual settlers at 25 cents per acre, but, unlike, Mr. Grow's bill, not including preëmptions by those then occupying public lands. This substitute was in turn rejected by the House, but after long conferences an agreement was arrived at and the Senate bill, with slight amendments, accepted. Mr. Colfax, of Indiana, reported it and it passed both Houses, but was promptly vetoed by President Buchanan.

During all these years of agitation in Congress Mr. Grow was rightly regarded as the champion of the homestead-law principle, and to his untiring energy more than to any other individual effort is due the final success of the measure.

On July 4, 1861, at an extra session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, Galusha A. Grow was elected Speaker of the House, and while filling that exalted position had the felicity and gratification of affixing his name as Speaker to Mr. Aldrich's homestead bill, which was nearly identical with that introduced by himself in the preceding Congress.

As before said, much of the credit of that great and important measure, so conducive to the welfare and prosperity of our country, is due to our illustrious fellow-citizen, the presentation of whose protrait to this House by the Legislature of Pennsylvania is the cause of this special gathering to-day.

While I believe all Pennsylvanians are proud of the Congressional career of Mr. Grow and his record as Speaker of the House, I feel to an extraordinary degree the honor and privilege of this opportunity to pay a deserved tribute to the ability and tact with which he filled the Speaker's chair during the turbulent and exciting days from 1861 to 1863.

It required ability and courage of the very highest order to preside over the deliberations of the House of Representatives at a time when the nation was assaulted from within and threatened from without; when the greatest war of the century, threatening the very life of the Republic, was in progress, and the political passions of men aroused as never before since the formation of the Government; when millions of men were mustered and equipped for service in the field, and thousands of millions of treasure raised to carry on the war for the preservation of the Union.

How well Mr. Grow filled the chair during these years of unparalleled excitement and strife is best evidenced by the unanimous vote of thanks given him by the members of the House of Representatives at the close of his term.

As a citizen of the same State and county, and representing a constituency that largely helped to elect him in the days long gone by, I feel more than a passing joy at thus beholding the great honor once conferred on him perpetuated by the placing of this excellent portrait among those of the other illustrious men who have occupied the Speaker's chair during the first century of this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. McALEER. Mr. Speaker, the relation of the State of Pennsylvania to the past history of the House of Representatives has been distinguished and almost unique. At no time has she failed to have within these halls one or more Representatives of conspicuous ability and marked force in the deliberations of the body. In the Continental Congress the names of Benjamin Franklin and Robert Morris were alone sufficient to make their State famous. The Speaker of the First Federal Congress, Frederick A. Muhlenberg, was a Pennsylvanian, distinguished for lofty character, patriotism, learning, zeal, and efficiency in the public service. Since then a long list of great names has preserved the prominence of the commonwealth of Penn in national legislation. The name of David Wilmot is imperishably linked with the legislative history that preceded the rebellion, and during the exciting period of the civil war the confessed leader of the dominant party on this floor was that robust, practical, dexterous, and forceful genius, the great commoner of his time, Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania.

To-day we are engaged in proceedings intended to permanently honor two other Representatives of this State whom former Congresses exalted to preside over their deliberations—Galusha A. Grow and Samuel J. Randall. The former of these, who presided over the Thirty-seventh Congress, ex-Speaker Grow, still lives within the Commonwealth he so ably served a generation ago, secure in the honor and respect of her people and exemplifying in ripened years all the virtues of private life and all the cultured dignity of distinguished citizenship. It is the hope of his fellow-citizens that he may long be spared to his country and his friends. The other was but recently called from service here by the inexorable voice of death. The echoes of his dirge still seem to linger in these halls, so fresh is the mournful recollection of his untimely taking off. It is as but yesterday that Samuel J. Randall was so notable a presence, so potent a force in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, I could not justify so early an intrusion on the attention of this body but for the fact that I have the honor to represent the same constituency that for fourteen consecutive terms chose Samuel J. Randall for their Congressman. The presentation of his portrait by the State of Pennsylvania would seem to demand from his successor some tribute to his eminent public services and noble example.

The story of his career has already been ably told by his colleagues in this body and by Senator QUAY in the other House. I can add little of interest as to the main facts of his life. Born in the city of Philadelphia, he early became identified with its municipal government as a member of councils. Then engaged in mercantile pursuits, it is quite likely he did not at that time deliberately contemplate or desire a career of exclusively public activity. There is nothing in the record of his councilmanic experience to suggest the singular capacity he afterwards displayed as a parliamentarian, politician, and statesman. From city councils he was elevated to the senate of his State, and after one term of service he was elected by the Third Congressional district a Federal Representative in the year 1862. The relationship then formed between that constituency and Samuel J. Randall knew no severance until it was broken by death. Fourteen times was the public trust between Representative and people renewed, and in all that long term of continuous service there never was an hour when the constituency faltered, hesitated, doubted in its allegiance to its Representative.

Sir, there must have been some peculiar kinship that thus bound this people to their public servant. What was it? A relationship so honorable and long continued deserves more than passing allusion. It was not identity of social ties or extraction. Mr. Randall came of a stock that was conspicuous in the upper social walks. His constituency comprised the plainest of the "plain people," whom Mr. Lincoln so often referred to as his trust and staff. Stretching along the Delaware in a narrow line through the oldest part of Philadelphia the Third Congressional district comprised, as it still comprises, a people singularly homogeneous and singularly distinct from the rest of the city.

Rank has made no distinctions among them, for there are few rich and few pretentious in their number. Most of them live by daily toil in the humblest of human industries. The most arduous trades, stevedoring and shopkeeping employ the greater number, and in trite language, the Third Congressional district would be called a "poor constituency."

But, Mr. Speaker, Randall lived and died a poor man, too, and like him, they were too rich and too honest ever to permit another to own or buy their judgment or their vote. Then, too, they are a manly people. They hate shams, cant, and hypocrisy. Their Representative was conspicuous among public men for candor and directness. They are a brave people—strong in their convictions, aggressive in opposition, loyal to their political faith, and averse to shifty compromises—they have all the sterling masculine traits of a plain people, unseduced by power and unenervated by wealth. Mr. Randall was a model of manly courage, physically, morally, intellectually, and politically. His honesty was never drugged by ambition or daunted by numbers. It grew in intensity and assertiveness when wealth and power and respectability augmented and sheltered the forces of corruption. He was never more heroic than when leading the forlorn hope of honest government against the combined allies of spoilsmen and jobbers, placemen and favorites.

The lobby had no vocation when Randall was Speaker. He was intellectually brave. He never disguised his convictions to his friends, to his foes, or to himself. He might be wrong, but he never could be misunderstood. He followed the truth as his reason revealed it, regardless of the consequences to his own fortunes. The threat of a caucus was as powerless to intimidate him as a bribe was to tempt him. He was politically brave. He was a Democrat of the most pronounced type and most constant party loyalty. If, upon economic principles, he differed with the majority of his party as to the practicability of some legislative measures, he ever yielded the most earnest support to party candidates and party causes. His Democracy in essential matters was almost a religious conviction.

While preserving in a remarkable degree the respect and friendship of the leaders of the opposing party, he was yet their most tireless, resourceful, and implacable antagonist. Nevertheless, his opposition was without bitterness. He was too large-minded to attach resentments to mere difference of opinion. For open foes he had respect and admiration; he hated only a treacherous friend. For many years actively engaged in the political contentions in his State, yet the kindest and friendliest relations always existed between himself and the prominent men of his party. So true is this, that his most conspicuous rival for party supremacy—once an honored and valued Senator, and still the foremost leader of his party in the State, William A. Wallace—presented the name of Mr. Randall to the Democratic National Convention of 1880 for nomination for the Presidency.

I know it was Randall's purpose, had he lived, to have named Senator Wallace to the State convention of 1890 as his choice for governor of the Commonwealth. Such amenities sweeten active political life and redeem it from its most intolerable features. Yet his life was not entirely free from some of the bitterness that accompanies political activity. He, too, had known the Judas kiss and felt the stab in the back from the hand he had nourished. All other wrongs he could forget and forgive, but he was too great and too true and too honest himself not to despise and loathe a false and traitorous friend.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to suggest some of the personal traits which bound Mr. Randall to the Democracy of the Third Congressional district. They are worthy of note since the attachment they caused was alike honorable to him and to his constituency.

And, sir, after all, were not these the same traits that gave Samuel J. Randall his national reputation, that made him a trusted adviser in his party, a heroic leader in legislative conflict, and an honored presiding officer of three Congresses? No man's public life in our history was a more perfect reflex of his private virtues and personal characteristics. Too often public men on the official stage act a part which does not disclose their true character. It was not so with Mr. Randall. The traits that endeared him to his family, to his friends, and to his constituency were the same traits that marked him when he stood in the view of the nation. He was real, and true, and unpretentious in every situation. He wrote no treatise and compiled no memoirs; he left no collection of speeches that will be handed down to the political student, and no enactment on the statute book bears his name. Yet he was a potential agency in legislation that has seldom been exceeded in any single Representative. He left his impress upon the political and legislative policy of his time, as Emerson says the hero conquers, by his presence. His force of character alone, unaided and unobtruded, raised him to the distinction and power that he achieved. I know of no finer illustration in our history of the irresistible force of honesty, integrity, and fidelity united to the homeliest capacity. Some such example was needed, and is still needed, if the youth of the land are not to be seduced by the too frequent success in public life of principles and methods that would be execrated if they were not successful.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult in analyzing a life like Mr. Randall's to illustrate by many conspicuous incidents the qualities that exalted him. This is often true of many conspicuously useful lives. The most valuable characteristics are not always the most showy. Other speakers at other times have recounted the details of his public career. It is not my desire to repeat that story, instructive and interesting as it is. I shall content myself with briefly summarizing his most distinguishing public characteristics.

He was an undemonstrative man, and of simple habits and life. No great character since the foundation of the Republic lived a more unostentatious, sincere, and democratic life than he.

He was easy of access, and recognized the absolute equality of citizenship. This was a trait of his essential democracy. The lowliest voter in his district could see its Representative as freely and would be received as cordially and as respectfully as the richest and most potential.

He was absolutely sincere. No man could or did ever say that Randall misled him or that he was disappointed in Samuel J. Randall.

He was thoroughly honest. It ought to be a matter of no great distinction to say that a public man is honest. But Randall's honesty was of a kind and at a time when it necessarily became conspicious and memorable. It was as "a river of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." If when the Democracy regained power in this Chamber Mr. Randall or a man like him for honesty had not led his party, its return to power would have vanished as a dream. Will it be doubted that when in 1874 a political tidal wave gave the House of Representatives to the Democracy, the manly and defiant presence of Randall held the forces of corruption aloof? The champion of honesty conquered corruption by his presence.

His patriotism was above party, and comprehended his country as the supreme object of his affections and his labors. I can not better express his ideal of duty and devotion than by quoting his words when, upon an occasion similar to this, he stated his estimate of the obligations and powers of the Speaker of this House. Nothing could be clearer, more forcible, or more impressive than the following sentences:

> When it fell to my fortune to occupy the Speaker's chair I realized how true was my idea of the position and its possibilities; and I do not believe there is anyone worthy of being mentioned in connection with it who, the very instant he takes it, will not become so broad and generous in the scope of his political vision as to act regardless of individual and personal consequences, and only for the best interests of the American people as his judgment shall dictate.

These words are worthy of being graven over the door of this Chamber as an immutable law of the Republic. Patriotism has never reached a higher utterance. Country first and party after—this was the creed of Samuel J. Randall. And how well he exemplified it. It fell to his lot to be Speaker of the House at one of the most critical stages of our history. The peace of the nation hung in the balance. The Presidency was at stake, and the party of Mr. Randall unanimously believed that Samuel J. Tilden was of right entitled to the office. Mr. Randall, too, believed it most profoundly. But in the Speaker's chair he felt he owed to the laws and to the safety of the Republic a duty paramount to any mere party obligation. Therefore it was that with face steadfastly set toward the public weal he bent all the power of his office towards a peaceful and legal settlement of the controversy. One look, one word of doubt from him would have precipitated a conflict that would have wrapped the land in sorrow, bloodshed, and anarchy. The nation owes him an inestimable debt of gratitude that he then held the inflammable elements of party in check and saved the Union of States, though his party lost the Presidency. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war."

He was courageous. Who that saw Samuel J. Randall then presiding over the smoldering passions of party could doubt his courage? A weak and timid man in his place would have been the ruin of his country. A partisan or a coward would have betrayed constitutional government.

He was capable, instructed, and tireless in the public service. Need I recall the memorable struggle over the "force bill." The leader of a minority threatened with a measure that meant political destruction to his party, he so led his forces that he averted that result, and thus made possible every Democratic victory since. What an enviable fate was his to save by peaceful measures and by personal efforts, first his party, then his country.

Mr. Speaker, is his portrait not worthy to hang in these halls? May not every American, every lover of free institutions, every admirer of honesty, sincerity, and manhood do him reverence? The people of the Third Congressional district are proud of the honor they enjoy in having contributed Samuel J. Randall to the nation. May the people of the entire country, may the Congress of the States, ever bear in grateful recollection his services, his life, and his name. May the youth of the Republic never cease to emulate his achievements, his principles, and his character. His memory will endure so long as the love of patriotism, purity, and public virtue shall endure. [Applause.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I could not, if I would, add anything but my cordial approval to what has been so fitly and gracefully said of the distinguished Pennsylvanians whose features, durably preserved on canvas, will hereafter occupy conspicuous places in the tapestry of faces that will adorn the walls of the House. Nor can I, by placing upon the canvas of this occasion another figure, in any degree mar the pictures already there, nor dim the laurels that so fitly wreathe their brows.

But it has seemed to the Representatives of Pennsylvania in this House that this notable occasion would lack completeness if some allusion was not made to another distinguished Pennsylvanian who rose to equal eminence with those whose portraits have just been presented to the House. I have risen, therefore, at the suggestion of my colleagues, to perform in a feeble way the duty which they think the occasion imposes, to bring into more distinct view than heretofore and place upon record some observations on the character and public services of the first Pennsylvanian who presided over the deliberations of this body.

The Speaker of the first House of Representatives under the Constitution, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., on January 1, A. D. 1750. He died in the city of Lancaster, Pa., on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1811.

He came from a distinguished family of German Lutherans, a family which has filled with great credit many positions of eminence and honor both in church and state, five of whom have been members of this House—a family of scholars, divines, and statesmen, whose achievements include the honors of learning, ecclesiastical distinction, and civic renown.

His father was the founder and patriarch of the German Lutheran Church in America, and enjoyed a deserved preëminence in learning and piety.

His mother was the daughter of good Father Conrad Weiser, who became the pioneer of the Germans in the settlement of Pennsylvania, and through whom he is said to have derived a strain of aboriginal blood, and he did not quite conceal how proud he was of that drop of native-American blood, which was perhaps the only one that has figured in the parliamentary history of the country.

Born of pious parents, he was in his youth dedicated to the church; was educated at the University of Halle, and ordained as a minister in the year 1770. His employment in the ministry was of short duration. The time that was to try men's souls was at hand. His firm attachment to the American cause inclined him to more active exertions in its support.

It was thought by the Germans of Pennsylvania that they ought to have in the Continental Congress a representative of their particular interest. Mr. Muhlenberg's ardent patriotism and liberal acquirements fitted him in an exceptional degree for such a station, and he was elected a member of that body in March, 1779. He served, however, for a single year, when he was transferred to the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, and was the speaker of that body in the years 1781–'82. He was also a member of the council of censors of Pennsylvania in 1783–'84 and presided over that body.

Upon the organization of the county of Montgomery he was commissioned as a justice of the court, register of wills, and recorder of deeds. He was a delegate to the Pennsylvania convention to ratify the Federal Constitution in 1787, and presided over that body. At the first election for members of Congress under the Constitution he was a candidate on the anti-Federal ticket and was elected. On the organization of the House on the first day of April, 1789, he was elected to preside over its deliberations. He had a recognized genius for presiding. He remained in Congress four consecutive terms, and was reëlected Speaker of the Third Congress.

It is recorded that when he was nominated for the Third Congress the address to the people contained these words:

> The contest by which he was placed in a situation to be Speaker of the first House of Representatives in Congress will be commemorated for the honor of America as long as the Union lasts; and for Mr. Muhlenberg's honor the conduct which he observed in that arduous and important office ought never to be forgotten.

At the close of each Congress over which he presided he received a unanimous vote of thanks for the ability and courtesy with which he discharged the duties of the office, to which he replied in a few remarks of rare grace and felicity, which seemed to have set the fashion for a hundred years.

To intense patriotism Mr. Muhlenberg added a rare amplitude of understanding, a wide experience, a firm will, and great courage. To say that he possessed in a high degree that quickness and clearness of intellectual perception, that power of swift and accurate generalization, the capacity to comprehend by a lightning flash not only the nearest link, but the entire chain of a difficult situation, or that he possessed that facility for lucid statement which could make a proposition, however intricate, as clear to others as to himself, qualities which have given us in recent years some masterful Speakers, would not be justified by any information that we possess.

But the assemblage of qualities which he is known to have possessed could not fail to qualify him in an eminent degree for the Speaker's chair at the time he occupied it. There is no record extant that raises any doubt that he filled that most difficult of positions under our Government with distinguished ability, conspicuous courtesy, and entire impartiality.

True, the House at that time consisted of but sixty-five members; a small assembly compared with the present House, and much easier controlled. Disorder and tumult had not then been invited by an unwieldy multitude. The first House was never suffocated in its own smoke. Dignity and decorum were among its conspicuous characteristics. It was the initial period in our legislative history. It was the point of embarkation on our new voyage in our new ship. Buoys could not be followed. New channels must needs be marked out. The strength of the noble ship would hardly have saved it from destruction but for the skill and wisdom of such trusty pilots as Speaker Muhlenberg and his contemporaries, whose experience, knowledge, and foresight were important agencies in the organization of the new Government.

Mr. Muhlenberg carried with him to every field of his country's service that heroic spirit which was a notable characteristic of his family, which animated his distinguished brother when, standing in his pulpit the last time in full military uniform, poorly concealed by the symbol of his holy office, thrown carelessly over him, he uttered those memorable words, "There is a time for all things—a time to preach, a time to pray, and there is a time to fight, and that time has come." As his brother put conscience into his fighting, so did he put conscience into every public undertaking.

Devotion to duty, fidelity to conviction, loyalty to conscience, the elevation of public obligations above private interests, and the subjection of conduct in all situations to the restraints of moral principle, gems of character fit for a setting in the "wrought gold" of the deep moral basis of his life, were the attributes which enabled the first Speaker of the American House of Representatives to adorn with distinguished probity every situation to which he was ever called.

The dignity of his character, the elevation of his mind, and his unflinching will united in summing up a strong personality, which left its impress with great distinctness upon his country, and are elements which can not be overlooked in assigning him appropriate rank among the stars of nobleness that glitter on Pennsylvania's fair brow.

It is the singular felicity of that State to have furnished the first of that succession of illustrious statesmen who have presided over the deliberations of this body for a hundred years, illustrating the principles of American parliamentary law, and shedding conspicuous luster on the history of parliamentary leadership in the New World. But the memory of Mr. Muhlenberg's great character, his shining virtues, his useful public services, is the exclusive possession of no district. It is the Commonwealth's, the nation's. It is a part of that immortal heritage of glory that has descended from illustrious sires upon their sons, that they, like Hector's boy, might catch heroic fire from the recollection of the great and good men of the past who earned and enjoyed the just applause of having deserved well of their country.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as we gaze upon these distinguished faces, radiant with the great qualities which were exemplified in their public careers, speaking pictures, which seem as if the painter, after putting upon them the last touch of his art, had breathed into them the breath of life, let me express the prayer of Pennsylvania, in which every other State will joyfully unite, that that seat of eminence, that Olympian chair which has been filled by illustrious statesmen, will never be compromised by an occupant who will dim the splendor of our parliamentary succession. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the State of Pennsylvania, through a committee of her citizens, appointed for that purpose, now present, by invitation of the House, in this Hall, presents to the national House of Representatives the portraits of Galusha A. Grow and Samuel J. Randall, former Speakers of the House, and gentlemen now representing in Congress districts formerly represented by those eminent citizens and other gentlemen from that State have, in touching and eloquent words, spoken of their public services and submitted to the House the wishes of their great Commonwealth that the House shall accept these portraits.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to move that the House accept these portraits so gracefully presented by Pennsylvania, to become a part of the galaxy of portraits of illustrious men who have in the past presided over the national House of Representatives and of those who will in the coming ages fill that high post of honor—a galaxy that will be of ever-increasing interest, not only to those who will in the future occupy seats in this Hall, but to all the American people.

The legend "Republics are ungrateful" can not be applied to our Republic. The sentiment of public duty and honor has from the beginning been fortified and upheld by the generous applause which has followed the faithful fulfillment of a public trust. See in the halls of this Capitol how the States of the Union vie with each other in honoring the memory of their sons who have rendered valuable service to their country!

Galusha A. Grow was Speaker of the House during the Thirty-seventh Congress; Samuel J. Randall during the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress and during the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses. The period of time between the 4th day of July, 1861, when Mr. Grow was elected Speaker, and the 4th day of March, 1877, when Mr. Randall completed his first term as Speaker, embraced events of such magnitude as to be without comparison with any other period in our history except that in which our Republic was formed—perhaps of greater importance—for in that period the appeal to arms and the statesmanship that followed, which involved the question of African slavery, which the cupidity of Europe had fastened upon us and which the wisdom and patriotism of the fathers of the Republic could not solve, which statesmanship, with fear and trembling could only hold in abeyance for three-quarters of a century was finally and forever decided. If the beneficent results to mankind which the influence and example of this great Republic seem to assure shall be realized, the events of that period will stand in history in importance without comparison with any other in the current history of the world.

At 12 o'clock on the 4th day of July, 1861, in response to the proclamation of President Lincoln, Congress assembled. This city was a military camp. The hurried movement of armed men, the ceaseless notes of the war drum all told the sad story, "war is upon us." The basement of this Capitol was a depot of military supplies, and the whole landscape was a tented field.

Entering this Hall at noon on that 4th day of July, 1861, was an event long to be remembered. The gallaries were packed with an anxious and excited multitude, but, alas, on this floor how many seats were vacant! Even the old statesmen who had long served in this House and were devoted to the Union, who passed down this aisle a few months before and passed up to the Speaker notice that they had resigned their seats in the Thirty-sixth Congress and left this Hall with bowed heads and cheeks bathed with tears, were not here.

Yet it was a remarkable and memorable assemblage. Most of those present were comparatively new members, but some of the greatest men of our country were present. Here in this seat now occupied by my distinguished colleague [Mr. BROWN] sat John J. Crittenden, grave and silent; there, on the first aisle to the left, Charles A. Wickliffe, of Kentucky; yonder, on the second aisle on the right, Thaddeus Stevens, his strong face expressing decision of purpose; further on, Elihu B. Washburn, of Illinois, then known as the father of the House. Men then known to the whole country, and who connected the past glories of the Republic with the hour of its deadly peril, a peril which patriots had seen from the beginning, but hoped to die before the dreaded issue would drench the land with the blood of intestine war.

Under circumstances like these there was little formality in organizing the House. John Hickman, of Pennsylvania, nominated Francis P. Blair jr., the young and ambitious member from Missouri, afterwards so distinguished as a general in the Union Army, for Speaker.

Thaddeus Stevens nominated Galusha A. Grow, who had served ten years in the House as the successor of David Wilmot, well known to the country as the author of the "Wilmot proviso" against the extension of slavery.

Fourteen members of the House were voted for as Speaker. Francis P. Blair, jr., in person withdrew his name and voted for Mr. Grow. One hundred and fifty-nine votes were cast, and John W. Forney, Clerk of the former House, a historical character, announced the election of Mr. Grow as Speaker of the House of the Thirty-seventh Congress by a very large majority. He had received nearly two-thirds of the votes cast.

Speaker Grow, with a resolute and earnest face, took the Speaker's stand and delivered his address. It was full of patriotic sentiment, well in harmony with the feeling of Republicans and Democrats alike who were members of the House. As he uttered the following words the silence of even the gallery was profound, and tears glistened in the eyes of many of the older members.

If the Republic is to be dismembered and the sun of its liberty must go down into endless night, let it set amid the roar of cannon and the din of battle, when there is no longer an arm to strike or a heart to bleed in its cause, so that coming generations may not reproach the present with being too imbecile to preserve the priceless legacy bequeathed by our fathers, so as to transmit it unimpaired to future times. [Applause.]

This was an auspicious beginning. The noble words I have quoted exactly expressed the spirit of the House. The period during which Mr. Grow presided as Speaker was full of anxiety, sometimes of alarm for the public safety; but Republicans and Democrats alike were confident that the cause of the Union would triumph. There was never a day or an hour even during the session of the 22d of July, the day after the battle of Bull Run, when either Republican or Democratic members felt apprehension of the final result. The anxiety was as to the basis on which the Union should be restored.

Speaker Grow filled his great office so well that I do not think a single appeal was taken from his decisions, and before he announced on the 4th day of March, 1863, the final adjournment of the Thirty-seventh Congress, he had received the cordial commendation of his course as Speaker from every member of the House.

I should add that while Mr. Grow was courteous and considerate as the presiding officer of the House and impartial and just in his decisions, he himself was treated by the members, Democrats and Republicans, with more consideration and kindness in that period of public danger than might have occurred under other conditions.

But Galusha A. Grow left the Speaker's chair with the sincere respect and kindly wishes of all the members of the Thirty-seventh Congress, with the universal feeling that he had filled the great office, at one of the most trying periods in our history, ably, impartially, and well.

Mr. Randall was first elected Speaker on the first Monday in December, 1876, at the opening of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, Michael C. Kerr, who was elected Speaker at the opening of that Congress, having died during the vacation, in early manhood. His death was sincerely regretted by every member of the House. Mr. Randall was reëlected Speaker of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses; one of the few instances where any member ever held the office for so long a period.

The interval between the 4th of March, 1863, when Speaker Grow laid down the gavel, to the first Monday in December, 1876, when Mr. Randall first called the House to order as Speaker, was full of great events.

The tremendous armies, the military resources, the terrific battles involved on this great theater in deciding the issue which successive generations of men had transmitted to that period, astonished all Europe, where for centuries the unsheathed sword was the only symbol of power.

To the statesmen of Europe one result was inevitable: the millions of men North and South, accustomed to the pursuit of arms, could never return to the self-restraint and peaceful industries of a Republic. Guerrilla warfare would in any event overthrow the voluntary obedience to law on which free institutions must rest; hence France, with the approval of other European powers, established imperialism in Mexico. But when the last decisive battle was fought the millions of men of the North and of the South in arms at once understood how the issue of the war was decided. The great armies melted away as if by magic, and at once these millions of men North and South, as if in gigantic rivalry, began to restore and build up peaceful industries on the smoldering ruins of war. The Union was restored.

This unexampled event changed the face of the whole political world. Only a note from the United States to the Emperor of France and every symbol of imperialism in Mexico turned to "dust and ashes," and that Republic entered upon a career of greatness not previously achieved!

How will the historians of the coming ages, ever seeking to discover a cause for a great event, point to the everliving force of a great example—Washington, when the last battle of the war of the Revolution was fought, with simple majesty, appearing before Congress and modestly delivering up the commission which Congress seven years before had given him to "Command the forces raised or to be raised in defense of American liberty," and gladly returning to his beautiful home on the banks of the Potomac. Who shall say that these great armies, without tumult or disorder, returning to their homes and to peaceful industries, were not animated by the spirit of that illustrious example!

When Samuel J. Randall first assumed the seat of the Speaker, and, with a face expressing manly self-reliance, called the House to order, how wonderful the contrast with the scene when his personal friend, Galusha A. Grow, assumed that office. Every seat in this great Hall was filled, and a more kindly and fraternal feeling existed among the members from the States North and South, a more lively interest in the general welfare, than had been known in Congress for more than two generations.

Mr. Randall had a larger experience in legislative procedure than Mr. Grow, and became a great master in parliamentary law. No man who was ever Speaker more largely or more beneficially influenced the general course of our legislation. But while the whole period of his Speakership was one of great Congressional activity, he encountered the greatest question of that period at the very threshold.

The Electoral Commission, which was in effect created to decide who were elected President and Vice-President in 1876 and the method of procedure, was provided for by an act of Congress when it was uncertain which party would have the advantage in organizing the Commission.

Mr. Randall was a Democrat, a positive partisan of the Jeffersonian school. He believed that Tilden and Hendricks had been respectively elected President and Vice-President of the United States in the Presidential election of 1876, and was a warm personal friend of both. When it became obvious that under the decisions of the Commission Mr. Hayes would be declared elected President, the political friends of Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks were furious in their indignation at what they deemed partisan decisions of that great Commission, but Mr. Randall resolved at once to stand by the law. For this determination he was more fiercely assailed in the excitement of the hour by his political associates and friends than I have ever seen a Speaker of the House assailed by his political enemies. It was an hour of fiery passion and tumult, but he did not quail or "yield a tithe of a hair," but firmly breasted the storm. "It is the law," he exclaimed, "and must be executed." I know of no greater display of fortitude in all our history. All the centuries have delighted to honor illustrious examples of obedience to law and public duty in the old republics, but none exceed in the greatness of the occasion or in the unflinching fortitude displayed than that which occurred in this Hall on that memorable occasion.

The historian in the progress of time will explain how the disaster of civil war was averted by the fortitude of Samuel J. Randall in resisting the passions of the hour in obedience to law.

No man in public life suffers by performing his duty. After this memorable contest Mr. Randall was with general approval twice elected Speaker of the House.

I take from an elaborate article published at the time of Mr. Randall's death in the New York Sun, whose distinguished editor, Gen. Charles A. Dana, was a warm friend of Mr. Randall, the sentiments I at the time expressed, as published in that article, of the character of Mr. Randall after years of association with him in the affairs of this House:

> Mr. HOLMAN, who served with Mr. Randall on the Appropriations Committee for many years, said that Mr. Randall was one of the greatest men of his time, and that during the years he was in Congress he had done more to shape legislation and had impressed his views more clearly upon our statute books than any other man in either House. He was a man of unswerving integrity, and would never support any measure which involved any useless or extravagant expenditure, even if it was to be spent in his own district; but if, on the other hand, the bill was for the good of the country, it found in him a warm friend and earnest advocate. "Mr. Randall," added Mr. HOLMAN, "was by long odds the ablest member of the House, and was one of its most loved and respected members."

It is a pleasant memory to me that after intimate association with Mr. Randall for nearly a quarter of a century in the current business of the House we never differed in opinion on public questions except on one, the tariff, and as to that, as between ourselves, knowing each other's views, we never discussed it. That he was surrounded by a great body of personal and political friends who differed with him on that issue was natural; he was a born leader among men. His magnanimity and fidelity to duty secured him public esteem, and loyalty to his friends won to him their sincere love and affection.

Pennsylvania, with a history of great characters whom the whole world delights to honor—Penn and Franklin and their successors, who honored public life—can safely place in her list of eminent citizens the names of Galusha A. Grow and Samuel J. Randall, and this national House of Representatives will, I am sure, express the sentiments of the whole people by accepting their portraits.

There is no blemish on the record of either of their lives, and each in the high office they held rendered valuable service to their country. They were both young men when they became Speakers. Their manners in the Speaker's chair were different. Mr. Grow, with a countenance bright and cheerful, carefully noted the current of events. Mr. Randall, whose face was singularly elegant in the classical outline of its features, sat in his chair firm and sedate, and with a never-absent expression in his manners of self-reliance. Mr. Grow spoke fluently in deciding a question. Mr. Randall did not use a word more than was necessary to express his opinion and leave no doubt of his meaning. In times of turbulence Mr. Grow, by the pleasant courtesy of his appeal, brought the House to order; Mr. Randall rising from his seat, with every feature of his face and every rap of the gavel expressing the authority of the Speaker, quelled the tumult. Both were fair, just, and impartial, and always sustained by the House.

Mr. Grow as a legislator is most famous as one of the first, if not the first champion of the homestead policy of disposing of the public lands, the most beneficent measure ever enacted by Congress; Mr. Randall as the champion of the maxim "frugality in a republican government can alone secure honesty and purity in its administration."

While differing in characteristics as Speakers of the House—while one was a Republican the other a Democrat—both were alike devoted to the welfare, the honor, and prosperity of their country.

Samuel J. Randall, the work of his life completed, leaving a great record of beneficent public service, scarcely nineteen months ago passed on to that better country where the just and the good flourish in immortal youth. And his fellow-citizens have written his epitaph in imperishable words "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Galusha A. Grow, in the vigor of life, is still in our midst, respected and honored by his countrymen in all the States of the Union. He is now gracing, as of old, the Speaker's chair by the side of the now honored Speaker of the House, a pleasing incident of this hour. I feel that I will have the sympathy of every member of the House in expressing the hope that a beneficent Providence will prolong his life for many years, that he may behold, year after year, in the ever-growing prosperity of our country, the value of the Union of the States which he so manfully upheld. [Applause.]

I therefore, Mr. Speaker, submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has received with great satisfaction the portraits of Hon. Galusha A. Grow, Speaker of the Thirty-seventh Congress, and Hon. Samuel J. Randall, Speaker of the Forty-fourth Congress at its second session and of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, presented by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and will cause them to be placed and preserved among those of the other distinguished men who in times past have presided over the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th of April, 1891, the governor of Pennsylvania approved "An act to provide for the presentation of the portraits of Samuel J. Randall and Galusha A. Grow to the House of Representatives of the United States Congress and making an appropriation for the painting of the same."

In pursuance of that act of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the paintings have been finished and this day tendered to the House of Representatives for its acceptance.

A resolution accepting the same has been offered and ably supported by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and I find sincere pleasure in seconding that resolution.

Every member of this House will, I am sure, cordially support the resolution. All will welcome the faces of these distinguished public servants to the gallery where may be seen the men who have presided over the United States House of Representatives.

By this act of the State of Pennsylvania a high honor is conferred upon this body, and by that act Pennsylvania does but justice to herself.

These great men by their private and public lives won honors for their country and their State. Their country and State will to-day unite in bearing witness to the merits of these true sons of Pennsylvania—sons of the Republic.

GALUSHA A. GROW

was born at Ashford, Windham County, Conn., August 31, 1823, and still lives to enjoy the respect of his countrymen.

I believe that he is of Puritan extraction, and is a pure extract of that historic stock. At 10 years of age his mother with her six children moved to Pennsylvania, his father having died when he was 3 years of age.

At 21 years of age we find him graduated at Amherst College, and he was admitted to the bar in 1847. But this good work, accomplished while yet so young, left him with impaired health. Seeking to recover his health, he engaged in surveying wild lands and occasionally in rafting.

In these pursuits he rapidly gathered a knowledge of men, an insight into character, a keen knowledge of and sympathy for the poor and the workers, and these vigorous, manly pursuits quickly restored him to health and equipped him with the vigor so soon to be needed in a great public career during the most trying period of his country's life.

In 1850 he was elected to the Thirty-second Congress from the old Fourteenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, and was successively reëlected to the Thirty-third, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses. During the Thirty-seventh Congress he was Speaker of this House. In the Thirty-fifth Congress he was the Republican nominee for Speaker when James L. Orr, of South Carolina, was elected. He particularly distinguished himself as a member of the Committee on Territories, of which committee he was chairman, in the Thirty-fourth Congress.

It will be remembered that during this period there was an unyielding struggle between those who believed in free and those who believed in slave territory. The Committee on Territories was the great committee of power on this vital question, a question deeply underlying the great rebellion.

In the desperate struggle before the war to push slavery into free territory Galusha A. Grow took a leading part and proved himself to be a far-seeing, broad-minded statesman, an able debater, and an uncompromising, true, warm-hearted friend of humanity and freedom.

A close student of history thus speaks of Mr. Grow's relation to that period and to the period itself:

This period of Mr. Grow's service, from 1851 to 1863, was one full of excitement and peril both to individuals and the country, and exacted of its principal free-soil actors, in efforts to honestly and independently perform their constitutional duties, the highest moral and physical courage. The pro-slavery leaders were arrogant, defiant, and aggressive. Their great ambition was to dominate in all the affairs of the nation, to subordinate all the forces of the Government and "freedom, free speech, and free men," in the maintenance of a tyrannical and demoralizing rule; to seize on our virgin Territories, to degrade them into slave communities, and to violently stamp out, in blood, all opposition to their arbitrary and unlawful edicts. Thus Kansas by the "border ruffians," supported by all the powers, military and civil, of the National Government, was degraded into an Aceldama—a field of blood; and even principal cities were dragooned into pursuit of hapless fugitive slaves.

The spirit that dominated the slave power in "bleeding Kansas" was as surely on the alert at the national capital. A Senator was murderously assailed in his seat and "the code" was flourished in the faces of free-soil members. These times must be recalled and understood in order to comprehend the character and services of Galusha A. Grow.

Amid all these trying scenes and events he was calm, independent, fearless, and resolutely coolly fought the battle of freedom on this floor. No danger or threat drove him from the performance of his constitutional duties. Hesitation in the face of duty and danger was no part of the character of this calm, iron-made man.

To measure character take it not in life's sunshine, but when the clouds and storms of life envelop it in trials and in sorrows. This test applied to Mr. Grow marks him as one of the calm, heroic characters in our country's history.

THE FATHER OF FREE HOMES.

Mr. Grow has also heavy claims upon the gratitude of the people of this country for having been the father of free homes.

In the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress, on January 4, 1858, he introduced his famous bill "to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain." His maiden speech in Congress was made on this question in May, 1852.

Although it failed at that session, it became the law of the land in 1863, and brought blessings that can not be estimated to toiling millions of his countrymen.

It was Mr. Grow's bill that became the homestead law, and he had the satisfaction of signing it as Speaker.

But while the champion of the actual home-seeker, he was the tireless enemy of the "land-grabber," and was ever on the alert to keep the public domain from passing into the hands of "syndicates" and "land barons," and during the Thirty-Fifth Congress he made repeated, though fruitless, efforts to secure legislation to keep that class from feeding and fattening on the public lands.

ON ALL GREAT QUESTIONS

he was brave and outspoken, and made a record showing great scope of intelligence and never-halting patriotism.

He was for "free speech, free soil, and free men;" he was for protection and against free trade. On the admission of Oregon, on the Lecompton and the English bill, and on the Crittenden-Montgomery compromise, on the proposition to appropriate millions for the purchase of Cuba, and on all great public questions he demonstrated his high character, his broad statesmanship, his devotion to his country, and his tender love for humanity.

AS SPEAKER

of this House he was fair, firm, and fearless, showing a keen regard for the laws of his country, the laws of this body, and the higher law which touches every heart from the divine source of all law.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL.

In speaking of Samuel J. Randall I feel as if speaking of one who is yet a part of us. The rapid step, the tireless energy, the cordial hand, the cheerful voice, and the friendly face are yet with us, and it is hard and unnatural to speak of him as being no longer here.

But the proceedings had in this House on April 14, 1890, and in the Senate on September 13, 1890, bear sad and eloquent evidence that this great son of Pennsylvania is dead.

When he fell, who was left that could wear his mantle?

When he fell, this country was startled and pained, knowing that it had lost a leader of such strong composite powers that the vacancy could not easily be filled.

He died April 13, 1890, at his post of duty, in the vigor of manhood, being but 61 years 6 months and 3 days old.

On both his father's and mother's side he came of stock that had been trusted by the people, and Mr. Randall was the improved product of that stock, and from early manhood commanded confidence among men and assumed leadership as his birthright. I say, assumed leadership. I should say accepted.

He was liberally educated, but had no ambition for a learned profession.

It has been said that "he was not a student." I do not agree to this. I knew him well, and pronounce him an ardent student—an untiring student.

Preachers are found outside of pulpits and churches. Teachers there are who never saw college or university. Students there are of government, of heart-beats, and of human actions who never read the classics, held diploma, or dreamed of alma mater.

To this class Mr. Randall belonged, and with restless, tireless mind he studied the great lessons of life and of government.

Serving for years with him on the Committee on Appropriations, I always found him armed with that knowledge that comes from hard work and careful study. Whatever was assigned to him to do was done—done well, and no needed preparation was ever neglected.

Whatever presented itself to be done by him was met more than halfway. He knew his duty by instinct, and was only happy when doing it and doing it well. He was called early into active public life, and grew stronger at every step.

His country in danger, and we find him in the ranks as a volunteer private soldier May 13, 1861. His fighting qualities quickly advanced him.

While fighting under Col. George H. Thomas his keen insight into character quickly detected the genius of Thomas, and we see him writing on a drumhead an earnest appeal that Col. Thomas be made a general. The splendid career of this officer attested the keen insight and sweep of vision of Mr. Randall as a student of character.

He was sent to the Thirty-eighth Congress, and served for twenty-eight years consecutively.

This House was his school, this country his university. Few ranked above him in his class.

A TRUE ECONOMIST

was Samuel J. Randall. He did not neglect any party advantage, but was slow to gain such advantage by crippling or starving his country.

AS SPEAKER

he was clear, and firmer than clear. He was kind but quick. In the chair and in debate he often won by rapidity of thought and action.

Let me give his own idea of the Speakership and in his own words. He regarded it as one of the highest honors that could be conferred upon an American citizen, and spoke of it as an office giving opportunity "to impress upon our history and legislation the stamp of truth, fairness, justice, and right."

Few portraits of ex-Speakers of this House will be hung in yonder gallery that will attract and hold more of our people or command more their affection and respect.

AS A FRIEND

he was as true and open as he was when a foe. Like all strong, intense natures, he loved and hated cordially; but like all truly great men, his loves predominated.

Once brought within the circle of his friendship, few could escape or ever wished to.

He was respectful to those in office, but more so to the simple citizen, untutored in the conventionalities of life, who approached him for aid or counsel. His respect for, and kind, gentle treatment of, the poor was the crowning glory of his life as a public man. The call or correspondence of the humblest citizen always met with the prompt and respectful attention due from the servant to the sovereign in the Republic.

A STRONG DEBATER.

Mr. Randall was a great power in debate, made all the more so because a thorough student in public affairs, gifted with a strong memory, quick of thought, and destitute of fear.

HE LOVED HIS COUNTRY and made the interests of all other nations secondary to those of the land of his birth.

Neither foreign blandishments, foreign sophistries, or foreign gold could tempt him.

He was true to labor and all home sources from which labor drew its food and its supplies. It can be truly said that "he was a tribune of the people."

HE WAS HONEST,

as is attested by the fact that after being in the public service as private, sergeant, captain, provost marshal, State senator, and member of Congress for nearly thirty-five years, and living modestly and economically, he died poor in pocket, though rich, very rich, in the love of his home, his State, and his country.

The question being taken, the resolution of Mr. HOLMAN was unanimously adopted.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman submits the resolution which will be read, and asks unanimous consent for its consideration now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the proceedings of the House attending the presentation to the House by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania of the portraits of Hon. Galusha A. Grow and Hon. Samuel J. Randall be printed for the use of the members of the House under the direction of the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The law provides that neither House of Congress shall, without the concurrence of the other, order any printing the expense of which shall exceed $500. Hence the action which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. POWERS] proposes requires a concurrent resolution. I therefore object to the present consideration of this resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on Printing, in order that a concurrent resolution may be reported by that committee.

Mr. POWERS. I am entirely content to have the resolution go to the Committee on Printing, and trust that they will report such amendment as may be deemed proper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that will be the better course. The committee will report promptly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was referred accordingly.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House adjourn.

Corcoran, the trustees of the estate of the late Lucius Tuckerman, and representatives of the estate of Mr. Riggs, Mr. Justice Gray, and numerous other property-owners on I street, protesting against the passage of the bill proposing to construct a street railway along I street and out Seventeenth street, known, I believe, as the "Zoo" Street Railway scheme.

The memorial sets forth in proper language reasons for the protest, and calls attention to the fact that this is another of the numerous efforts which have been made to advance the purposes of outside lot speculators to the ruin of inside property, and I earnestly hope that the present efficient Committee on the District of Columbia will see that none of these schemes is carried out to improper success.

in the Fifty-first Congress as the Butterworth option bill. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the petition in regard to the option bill so called had better go to the Judiciary Committee, as the bill on that subject has already been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that reference.

Mr. PADDOCK. In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, I wish to say that I understood that the petitions presented by the Senator from Iowa related also to the Conger lard bill.

SENATOR FROM TEXAS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were instructed by a resolution of December 12, 1891, to inquire into and report upon the circumstances and validity of the appointment of Mr. CHILTON of Texas to a seat in the Senate from that State, to submit a report. I desire that the resolution with which the report concludes may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. HORACE CHILTON, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. John H. Reagan, which had previously been made to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

Mr. HOAR. I will not ask for action on the resolution at this time; but I think the report, which is brief, should be printed in the RECORD, and I shall call up the resolution in the course of a few days.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. And also printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will also be printed as a document. The resolution will lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were directed by resolution of December 12, 1891, to inquire into and report upon the circumstances and validity of the appointment of Mr. CHILTON to a seat in the Senate from the State of Texas, have complied with said resolution, and respectfully report:

Mr. Reagan, elected Senator from the State of Texas for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1887, resigned his office, the resignation to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891. The executive of the State of Texas on the 25th day of April, 1891, and after the receipt of the resignation of Mr. Reagan, appointed Mr. CHILTON to fill the vacancy occasioned by said resignation. Mr. CHILTON'S credentials set forth the resignation of Mr. Reagan, and further declare—

"Now, therefore, I, J. S. Hogg, governor of the State of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Texas, do hereby appoint HORACE CHILTON, of Smith County, Tex., Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Texas to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. John H. Reagan. This appointment to take effect the 10th day of June, A. D. 1891."

The certificate bears date April 25, 1891.

Mr. CHILTON is in all other respects duly qualified to be a Senator from the State of Texas. The only question is whether the governor might lawfully make this appointment before the resignation of Mr. Reagan actually took effect.

The provision of the Constitution affecting the question is as follows:

"ART. I, Sec. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, * * * and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

A similar state of facts has arisen in a number of instances since the Constitution went into operation.

The term of Uriah Tracy, Senator from Connecticut, expired March 3, 1801; he was appointed by the governor of Connecticut, February 20, 1801; "from the 3d of March next until the next meeting of the Legislature of said State," the Legislature of the State not being in session at the time of said appointment or thereafter until after said 4th of March. Exception being taken to his credentials, he was admitted to the seat by a vote of 13 yeas to 10 nays, and held the seat during the special session of the Senate, March 4 and 5.

Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, was appointed by the executive February 6, 1809, to fill the vacancy which would result from the expiration of his term, March 3, 1809. He held the seat under these credentials during the special session of the Senate, March 4 to March 7, 1809.

John Williams, of Tennessee, was appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy which would result from the expiration of his own term, March 3, 1817. Under these credentials he held his seat from March 4 to 6, 1817.

John McPherson Berrien, of Georgia, resigned by letter dated Washington, May 28, 1852, addressed to the President pro tempore, and read in Senate same date. (Globe, first session, Thirty-second Congress, p. 1493.)

Robert M. Charlton, his successor, appeared June 11, 1852, with credentials signed by the governor of Georgia, and dated May 18, 1852, to take effect from and after May 31, 1852. He was sworn and took his seat without objection. (Senate Journal, first session, Thirty-second Congress, p. 468.)

March 4, 1825, James Lanman, of Connecticut, presented credentials showing an appointment made February 8, 1825, by the governor of the State, to fill the vacancy about to result from the expiration of his term, March 3, 1825. Objection being made, Mr. Lanman was refused a seat by a vote of 23 to 13. There is no historical evidence from which we can determine on what ground the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman, whether it was on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a term, or on the ground that the governor could not lawfully make the appointment in anticipation and before a vacancy occurred, and before he could possibly know whether the Legislature might not be called together before that time. Judge Story (Const., sec. 727, n. 2) says:

"In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, a question occurred whether the State executive could make an appointment in the recess of the State Legislature in anticipation of the expiration of the term of office of an existing Senator. It was decided by the Senate that he could not make such an appointment. The facts were that Mr. Lanman's term as Senator expired on the 3d of March, 1825. The President had convoked the Senate to meet on the 4th of March. The governor of Connecticut, in the recess of the Legislature (whose session would be in May), on the 9th of the preceding February appointed Mr. Lanman as Senator, to sit in the Senate after the 3d of March. The Senate by a vote of 23 to 18 decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred."

The following statement appears in the National Intelligencer for Tuesday, March 8, 1825:

"An important constitutional question was yesterday decided in the Senate, by the refusal to admit Mr. Lanman to a seat in the Senate under a commission from the governor, granted before the expiration of Mr. Lanman's late term of service. This is the first time this question has been adjudicated under such circumstances as to form a precedent; and we presume it may now be considered a settled construction of the constitutional provision that a vacancy must have literally 'happened' or come to pass before an appointment can be made to fill it. The case has once been questioned and decided differently, but it was in strong party times, all the Federal members voting for the member's taking his seat, and all the Democratic members against it, under which circumstances the decision has not been much respected as a precedent. So far as it was a precedent it is now reversed."

Gorden's Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1827, appendix, note 1 B, states the ground of the decision in the same way, but manifestly bases the statement on the authority of the National Intelligencer.

On the other hand, Mr. Grundy, in his report from the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of Mr. Sevier, Senator from the State of Arkansas, who was appointed by the governor of Arkansas, January 17, 1837, to fill the vacancy which would occur on the 3d of March following, by the expiration of Mr. Sevier's previous term, declared that the decision in the Lanman case was on the ground "that the Legislature must provide for all vacancies, which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution." He distinguished Mr. Sevier's case from the Lanman case by the fact that the time that Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot, he having been one of the Senators appointed by the State on its admission.

Niles' Register of Friday, March 12, states the question in regard to the Lanman case:

"The question was whether the failure by the Legislature to make a choice of Senator constitutes the contingency in which the governor may appoint a Senator."

Mr. Benton, in his Thirty Years' View, states that the principal argument against the admission of Mr. Lanman was made by Mr. Tazewell, that argument being that the word "happen" in the Constitution could not apply to a foreseen event, bound to occur at a fixed period, and that therefore it was the right of the Legislature only to fill a vacancy which was foreseen, regular, and certain, and that there was no right in the governor to supply that omission.

Mr. Lanman was not admitted to the seat. There is nothing in the contemporary record of the debates or in the resolution which enables us to determine whether the majority of the Senate based its action on the ground stated by Mr. Benton to have been maintained by Mr. Tazewell, or on the ground stated by Judge Story and by the National Intelligencer. The case, therefore, is not an authority on either side of the question. So that it is impossible to determine whether the Senate meant to overrule the Tracy case on one ground or the other.

On the other hand, an examination of the very numerous cases where the executives of States have made appointments when the Legislature was not in session shows that in a great many of them the executive has postponed action, where the resignations were made to take effect at a future time or where the previous term had expired by its own limitation, until after the vacancy existed. In all probability this postponement was caused by a belief on the part of the executive that he had no authority to provide for filling a vacancy until it actually occurred, or at any rate, that the question was so far in doubt that it would be unsafe to make the appointment in anticipation.

So far, then, as the precedents are concerned it appears that in three cases persons so appointed have been admitted to their seats without question; that Mr. Tracy was admitted and Mr. Lanman rejected where the executive made the appointment in anticipation of a vacancy, there being a discussion in the Senate, but no satisfactory evidence of the grounds of the judgment; that in one case, that of Mr. Sevier, a person so appointed has been admitted, when the validity of the appointment was questioned upon other grounds, without raising this question specifically; and that in modern times the practice has been uniform for the State executive to delay appointment until the actual happening of the vacancy.

Under these circumstances it seems to us that the Senate may now determine the question unhampered by any precedents of its own.

We suppose that where the power is given to fill vacancies in public offices it has been the uniform practice to permit resignations of such offices to be made to take effect at a future day, and to hold that the appointing power is entitled to make the appointment in advance to fill the vacancy, to take effect when the resignation becomes operative, unless the language of the constitutional or statute provision under which the authority is exercised forbids such construction.

The Constitution of the United States, Article II, section 2, in providing for the appointing power, enacts:

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

We believe it has been the uniform practice of the Executive from the beginning to accept resignations which are to take effect in the future, and to make appointments, also to take effect in the future, to fill them. We suppose that a like practice also prevails in regard to the heads of Departments in the exercise of the appointing power conferred by law upon them. The language of the provision of the Constitution under consideration, that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature," seems to us to admit easily of a like construction. We do not suppose that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to establish different rules for these two cases.

The Senate has recently, after full consideration, determined that the constitutional provision that the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President permits the choice of an officer in advance of the actual occurrence of the contingency referred to, who may take the chair whenever the Vice-President may be absent, until the Senate otherwise order. In all these cases, including that which we are now considering, the important consideration is that it must have been the purpose of the framers of the Constitution, as it is clearly for the public interest, that the office as far as possible should always be filled. This consideration applies with peculiar force to the office of Senator. We should be very unwilling to establish a construction of the Constitution which would make it certain that in no case of the resignation of a Senator, however necessary that resignation might be, there should be a succession without a considerable interval.

This would bear with peculiar hardship upon States remote from the seat of Government, and might determine the policy of the country in great emergencies and in matters peculiarly affecting particular States, when such States were but partially represented or possibly not represented at all. The tendency of the opinion in the Senate, as evidenced by its more recent decisions, has been more and more to lead to a construction which, as far as possible, secures that the seats in the Senate should be filled without any interruption in the representation of the State. Thus, in the case of Mr. Bell and Mr. Blair, Senators from the State of New Hampshire, it has been held that the executive might fill the vacancy occurring at the beginning of the constitutional term in consequence of the failure or the inability of the Legislature to elect a Senator for that term, in compliance with the statute of 1866 (Revised Statutes, sections 14 and 19), in spite of very weighty and influential opinions to the contrary.

So it has been held and is now the settled construction, that if a vacancy occur during the recess of the Senate, and a person be regularly nominated to the Senate at its next session to fill it, and be rejected, and the Senate adjourn without the office being filled, the President is entitled to make a new appointment in the next vacation. So, if the officer died during the session, and if his death be not known until after the adjournment, as is said by Attorney-General Taney, in his able report (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 2, page 523):

"It is admitted by every one that the President may appoint in such cases, and the practice of the Government has continually conformed to that construction."

"It was the intention of the Constitution," Mr. Taney further says, "that the offices created by law and necessary to carry out the operations of the Government should always be full, or, at all events, that the vacancy should not be a protracted one." (See also, to the same effect, the opinion of William Wirt, 1 Op. Atty'ys Gen., 631.)

It has been suggested that if this construction be established it will be in the power of the governor of the State to provide by appointment for the filling of future vacancies long before they occur, and, therefore, the will of the people of the State, as it exists at or near the time of filling the vacancy, fail of being carried into effect. But the instances must necessarily be very rare indeed where the vacancy can be anticipated beforehand under circumstances which will create such a temptation to the executive. Against that, as against many other evils which are possible under a popular government, as under other governments, the protection in general must be in the character and integrity of the persons clothed with high public office.

We, therefore, are of the opinion that Mr. CHILTON was lawfully appointed by the executive of the State of Texas to the seat which he now holds, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. HORACE CHILTON, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. John H. Reagan, which had previously been made to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. TURPIE. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the papers, evidence, and certificates in the case of WILKINSON CALL and of the contestant, R. H. M. Davidson, respecting the question of a title to a seat in this body from the State of Florida, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. WILKINSON CALL, of Florida, was duly elected by the Legislature of said State on the 26th day of May, 1891, a Senator of the United States from said State for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1891, and that he is lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and in this connection I wish to state that I hope the committee will give the bill early consideration, inasmuch as it affects the interests of a large number of people who settled upon what were always believed to be public lands of the United States. But a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States seems to be adverse to that almost or quite universal belief in the State of Iowa, and in order that the settlers may be provided for by indemnity by the United States, I hope that the committee will give early consideration to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The United States gave the wreckage of our two United States ships wrecked in Samoa to the people there in consideration of their heroic efforts to save life. The wreckage has been provided for and sent to San Francisco, the only port in which it could be sold, and the duties demanded and collected took the entire profits of the operation, so that our friends the Samoans received actually nothing. MAJ. GREEN CLAY GOODLOE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the Committee on Claims may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 205) to reimburse Maj. Green Clay Goodloe, paymaster United States Marine Corps, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I will state that through an inadvertence of my own this misreference was made several weeks ago. A similar bill was referred at the last Congress to the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported, and passed by the Senate. I now ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state to the Senator from Kentucky that I was about to make that motion. I discovered that the bill had been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs last year, and the reference suggested by the Senator from Kentucky is the appropriate one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RELATIONS WITH CHILE.

[See House proceedings.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I move that the message, with the accompanying documents, be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. In view of the gravity and importance of the subject-matter, I do not think it expedient to make any remarks at this time.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the motion is put, I suggest to the Senator from Ohio the advisability of ordering the printing of 500 additional copies of the message for the document room of the Senate. There will unquestionably be a great demand for the document.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, I will accept that as a modification of my motion.

Mr. DOLPH. Would it not be better to make the number 5,000?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think 500 additional copies will reach the immediate demand. We can order more when they are exhausted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, as modified, that the message of the President of the United States, with accompanying documents, be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that 500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Chief Justice's Chamber, January 22, 1892.

To the VICE-PRESIDENT:

It becomes my painful duty to inform the Vice-President and the Senate of the death of Mr. Justice Bradley, which occurred at 6:15 o'clock this morning.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

MELVILLE W. FULLER,
Chief Justice of the United States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, it is with feelings of deep and sincere sorrow that we hear of the death of Associate Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, which occurred in this city on Friday morning at half past 6 o'clock.

Associate Justice Bradley was appointed from the State of New Jersey to the Supreme Court bench, receiving his commission and taking his seat as a member of that great tribunal in the year 1870, and for a period of twenty-two years, partly in times of great excitement and difficulty, and through a career in that court and of it embracing questions of the widest importance to human rights, involving life, liberty, and property, the associate justice had been a conspicuous figure in the jurisprudence of this nation, and perhaps not less conspicuous in respect of the jurisprudence of the world.

His career for this life is ended. His mortal remains will lie buried on the banks of the Passaic, in the soil of that State by whose people he was loved so well. Full of years and full of honors, he will ever be remembered as the upright, conscientious, and learned judge; the generous, affectionate citizen; the gentle and loving husband and father.

In every walk of private life he has filled his career with honor—great honor to himself and infinite benefit to his country.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have no doubt every member of the Senate has heard with the profoundest sadness that the great career of this venerable and illustrious jurist has come to a close.

It was the fortune of Mr. Justice Bradley to take his seat on the bench of the Supreme Court in a stormy and eventful time. A great civil war was just over; the relations of the States to each other and to the Union, the relations of great classes of men to the country and to each other, great questions involving the rights of vast corporations and valuable property, civil rights of citizens, the condition of the humblest and poorest citizens, in their homes, awaited settlement from that great tribunal which alike keeps the forces of State and nation within their appointed bounds and secures to the poorest person under the protection of the flag adequate protection in all the rights of humanity and citizenship.

In the discharge of these great judicial duties, it is no exaggeration to say that the figure which we are now to miss has ever been foremost. Judge Bradley goes to his grave amid the benedictions and with the honor of the whole American people, without an exception of party, of section, or of interest. He has been spared to an advanced age, and, as was felicitously said by the clergyman at his funeral yesterday, he kept to the time of his death an ever-replenished mind.

There has been no person whom it has been my fortune to know whose mental stores were of so various and so extensive a character, or who dealt with them with greater vigor and strength of native intellect.

Judge Bradley was a simple, sincere, reverent, and earnest believer in the Christian faith, which was alike the inspiration of his pure and honored life and his solace and comfort in the hour of death. As was said of John Jay, "when the ermine rested upon his shoulders it rested upon nothing which was not as white and as pure as itself."

I move, in token of our respect for the memory of Judge Bradley, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 26, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Walter F. Halleck, a wounded Union veteran, be authorized to act as an assistant doorkeeper of the House of Representatives from this date, under the direction of the Doorkeeper of the House, and that he receive compensation therefor at the rate of $1,500 per annum, the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think that matter ought to be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MEREDITH. I hope my friend from South Carolina will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to refer to the Committee on Accounts.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri; in which concurrence was requested.

It also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. 18) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

PRINTING OF REPORT, SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the year ending June 30, 1891, as follows:

Five hundred copies of the full report of the Board.

Five hundred copies of the report proper.

Five hundred copies of the report of the inspector of national and State homes.

One hundred and fifty copies of the record of members.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I suppose there will be no objection to this resolution. At the time the report was communicated to the House the Speaker pro tempore stated that it would not be printed on account of the voluminous character of the accompanying papers, but that it would be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and if that committee desired its printing, or the House so ordered, it would be printed. We have obtained an estimate of the cost of printing the number specified in the resolution, and the estimate for the printing of the whole number of documents is $329.29. It is necessary to print these reports for the use of the boards of managers and for the use of the House, and the printing would have been ordered at the time the report was communicated to the House had it not been for the desire of the Speaker pro tempore that the discretion of the committee should be exercised as to the number to be printed. Unless there is some further objection I move the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that that resolution has been reported by a committee of the House?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUSHNELL. What is the recommendation of the Committee?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The recommendation of the committee is that the resolution do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me for a moment I will make a statement pertinent to the printing that is asked for by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. A large number of communications were being received from the various Departments of the Government, the communications themselves being brief, but in many instances the accompanying documents being very voluminous. It was thought that some should be printed and others should not be. The Public Printer had complained that when these communications had been referred in past Congresses—and I am not referring to any particular Congress—frequently by one day's reference of these communications the business of the Public Printing Office would be blocked for days and weeks.

Therefore, occupying the chair, I took the liberty of stating to the House, in this and in many other instances of the same kind, that the Chair was unable to determine whether the voluminous documents accompanying the messages should be printed or not, and therefore would not order the printing, but would ask the reference of the documents to the appropriate committees, in order to allow the committees to report back whether or not the documents should be printed. The committee of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is a member, having performed that duty, report that these documents should be printed, and I have no doubt that the gentleman is strictly accurate in his statement of the matter. The action heretofore taken was in the line of economy in the public printing.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suspend the call to receive a message from the President.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the message just received; which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message, delivered to Congress at the beginning of the present session, after a brief statement of the facts then in the possession of this Government touching the assault, in the streets of Valparaiso, Chile, upon the sailors of the United States steamship Baltimore, on the evening of the 16th of October last, I said:

"This Government is now awaiting the result of an investigation which has been conducted by the criminal court at Valparaiso. It is reported unofficially that the investigation is about completed, and it is expected that the result will soon be communicated to this Government, together with some adequate and satisfactory response to the note by which the attention of Chile was called to this incident. If these just expectations should be disappointed or further needless delay intervene, I will, by a special message, bring this matter again to the attention of Congress for such action as may be necessary."

In my opinion the time has now come when I should lay before the Congress and the country the correspondence between this Government and the Government of Chile from the time of the breaking out of the revolution against Balmaceda, together with all other facts in the possession of the executive department relating to this matter. The diplomatic correspondence is herewith transmitted, together with some correspondence between the naval officers for the time in command in Chilean waters and the Secretary of the Navy, and also the evidence taken at the Mare Island navy-yard since the arrival of the Baltimore at San Francisco. I do not deem it necessary in this communication to attempt any full analysis of the correspondence or of the evidence. A brief restatement of the international questions involved and of the reasons why the responses of the Chilean Government are unsatisfactory is all that I deem necessary.

It may be well at the outset to say that, whatever may have been said in this country or in Chile in criticism of Mr. Egan, our minister at Santiago, the true history of this exciting period in Chilean affairs, from the outbreak of the revolution until this time, discloses no act on the part of Mr. Egan unworthy of his position or that could justly be the occasion of serious animadversion or criticism. He has, I think, on the whole, borne himself, in very trying circumstances, with dignity, discretion, and courage, and has conducted the correspondence with ability, courtesy, and fairness.

It is worth while also at the beginning to say that the right of Mr. Egan to give shelter in the legation to certain adherents of the Balmaceda Government who applied to him for asylum has not been denied by the Chilean authorities, nor has any demand been made for the surrender of these refugees. That there was urgent need of asylum is shown by Mr. Egan's note of August 24, 1891, describing the disorders that prevailed in Santiago, and by the evidence of Capt. Schley as to the pillage and violence that prevailed at Valparaiso. The correspondence discloses, however, that the request of Mr. Egan for a safe conduct from the country, in behalf of these refugees, was denied. The precedents cited by him in the correspondence, particularly the case of the revolution in Peru in 1865, did not leave the Chilean Government in a position to deny the right of asylum to political refugees, and seemed very clearly to support Mr. Egan's contention that a safe conduct to neutral territory was a necessary and acknowledged incident of the asylum.

These refugees have very recently, without formal safe conduct, but by the acquiescence of the Chilean authorities, been placed on board the Yorktown and are now being conveyed to Callao, Peru. This incident might be considered wholly closed but for the disrespect manifested toward this Government by the close and offensive police surveillance of the legation premises which was maintained during most of the period of the stay of the refugees therein. After the date of my annual message and up to the time of the transfer of the refugees to the Yorktown the legation premises seem to have been surrounded by police, in uniform, and police agents or detectives, in citizen's dress, who offensively scrutinized persons entering or leaving the legation and, on one or more occasions, arrested members of the minister's family. Commander Evans, who, by my direction, recently visited Mr. Egan at Santiago, in his telegram to the Navy Department described the legation as "a veritable prison," and states that the police agents or detectives were, after his arrival, withdrawn during his stay. It appears further, from the note of Mr. Egan of November 30, 1891, that on one occasion at least these police agents, whom he declares to be known to him, invaded the legation premises, pounding upon its windows and using insulting and threatening language toward persons therein.

This breach of the right of a minister to freedom from police espionage and restraint seems to have been so flagrant, that the Argentine minister, who was dean of the diplomatic corps, having observed it, felt called upon to protest against it to the Chilean minister of foreign affairs. The Chilean authorities have, as will be observed from the correspondence, charged the refugees and the inmates of the legation with insulting the police; but it seems to me incredible that men whose lives were in jeopardy, and whose safety could only be secured by retirement and quietness, should have sought to provoke a collision which could only end in their destruction, or to aggravate their condition by intensifying a popular feeling that, at one time, so threatened the legation as to require Mr. Egan to appeal to the minister of foreign affairs.

But the most serious incident disclosed by the correspondence is that of the attack upon the sailors of the Baltimore in the streets of Valparaiso on the 16th of October last. In my annual message, speaking upon the information then in my possession, I said:

"So far as I have yet been able to learn, no other explanation of this bloody work has been suggested than that it had its origin in hostility to these men as sailors of the United States, wearing the uniform of their Government, and not in any individual act or personal animosity."

We have now received from the Chilean Government an abstract of the conclusions of the fiscal general upon the testimony taken by the judge of crimes in an investigation which was made to extend over nearly three months. I very much regret to be compelled to say that this report does not enable me to modify the conclusion announced in my annual message. I am still of the opinion that our sailors were assaulted, beaten, stabbed, and killed, not for anything they or any one of them had done, but for what the Government of the United States had done, or was charged with having done, by its civil officers and naval commanders. If that be the true aspect of the case, the injury was to the Government of the United States, not to these poor sailors who were assaulted in a manner so brutal and so cowardly.

Before attempting to give an outline of the facts upon which this conclusion rests, I think it right to say a word or two upon the legal aspect of the case.

The Baltimore was in the harbor of Valparaiso by virtue of that general invitation which nations are held to extend to the war vessels of other powers with which they have friendly relations. This invitation, I think, must be held ordinarily to embrace the privilege of such communication with the shore as is reasonable, necessary, and proper for the comfort and convenience of the officers and men of such vessels. Capt. Schley testifies that when his vessel returned to Valparaiso, on September 14, the city officers, as is customary, extended the hospitalities of the city to his officers and crew. It is not claimed that every personal collision or injury in which a sailor or officer of such naval vessel visiting the shore may be involved raises an international question; but I am clearly of the opinion that where such sailors or officers are assaulted by a resident populace animated by hostility to the Government whose uniform these sailors and officers wear and in resentment of acts done by their Government, not by them, their nation must take notice of the event as one involving an infraction of its rights and dignity; not in a secondary way, as where a citizen is injured and presents his claim through his own government, but in a primary way, precisely as if its minister or consul or the flag itself had been the object of the same character of assault.

The officers and sailors of the Baltimore were in the harbor of Valparaiso under the orders of their Government, not by their own choice. They were upon the shore by the implied invitation of the Government of Chile and with the approval of their commanding officer; and it does not distinguish their case from that of a consul that his stay is more permanent or that he holds the express invitation of the local government to justify his longer residence. Nor does it affect the question that the injury was the act of a mob. If there had been no participation by the police or military in this cruel work and no neglect on their part to extend protection the case would still be one, in my opinion, when its extent and character are considered, involving international rights.

The incidents of the affair are, briefly, as follows:

On the 16th of October last Capt. Schley, commanding the U. S. S. Baltimore, gave shore leave to one hundred and seventeen petty officers and sailors of his ship. These men left the ship about 1:30 p. m. No incident of violence occurred; none of our men were arrested; no complaint was lodged against them; nor did any collision or outbreak occur until about 6 o'clock p. m. Capt. Schley states that he was himself on shore and about the streets of the city until 5:30 p. m.; that he met very many of his men who were upon leave; that they were sober, and were conducting themselves with propriety, saluting Chilean and other officers as they met them. Other officers of the ship and Capt. Jenkins, of the merchant ship Keweenaw, corroborate Capt. Schley as to the general sobriety and good behavior of our men. The Sisters of Charity at the hospital to which our wounded men were taken, when inquired of, stated that they were sober when received. If the situation had been otherwise, we must believe that the Chilean police authorities would have made arrests. About 6 p. m. the assault began, and it is remarkable that the investigation by the judge of crimes, though so protracted, does not enable him to give any more satisfactory account of its origin than is found in the statement that it began between drunken sailors. Repeatedly in the correspondence it is asserted that it was impossible to learn the precise cause of the riot. The minister of foreign affairs, Matta, in his telegram to Mr. Montt, under date December 31, states that the quarrel began between two sailors in a tavern and was continued in the street, persons who were passing joining in it.

The testimony of Talbot, an apprentice, who was with Riggin, is that the outbreak in which they were involved began by a Chilean sailor spitting in the face of Talbot, which was resented by a knock-down. It appears that Riggin and Talbot were at the time unaccompanied by any others of their shipmates. These two men were immediately beset by a crowd of Chilean citizens and sailors, through which they broke their way to a street car and entered it for safety. They were pursued, driven from the car, and Riggin was so seriously beaten that he fell in the street apparently dead. There is nothing in the report of the Chilean investigation made to us that seriously impeaches this testimony. It appears from Chilean sources that almost instantly, with a suddenness that strongly implies meditation and preparation, a mob, stated by the police authorities at one time to number 2,000 and at another 1,000, was engaged in the assault upon our sailors, who are represented as resisting "with stones, clubs, and bright arms." The report of the intendente of October 30 states that the fight began at 6 p. m. in three streets, which are named; that information was received at the intendencia at 6:15, and that the police arrived on the scene at 6:30, a full half hour after the assault began. At that time he says that a mob of 2,000 men had collected, and that for several squares there was the appearance of a "real battlefield."

The scene at this point is very graphically set before us by the Chilean testimony. The American sailors, who, after so long an examination, have not been found guilty of any breach of the peace, so far as the Chilean authorities are able to discover, unarmed and defenseless, are fleeing for their lives, pursued by overwhelming numbers, and fighting only to aid their own escape from death or to succor some mate whose life is in greater peril. Eighteen of them are brutally stabbed and beaten, while one Chilean seems, from the report, to have suffered some injury; but how serious or with what character of weapon, or whether by a missile thrown by our men or by some of his fellow rioters, is unascertained.

The pretense that our men were fighting "with stones, clubs, and bright arms" is, in view of these facts, incredible. It is further refuted by the fact that our prisoners, when searched, were absolutely without arms, only seven penknives being found in the possession of the men arrested, while there were received by our men more than thirty stab wounds, every one of which was inflicted in the back, and almost every contused wound was in the back or back of the head. The evidence of the ship's officer of the day is that even the jackknives of the men were taken from them before leaving the ship.

As to the brutal nature of the treatment received by our men, the following extract from the account given of the affair by the La Patria newspaper, of Valparaiso, of October 17, can not be regarded as too friendly:

"The Yankees, as soon as their pursuers gave chase, went by way of the Calle del Arsenal towards the city car station. In the presence of an ordinary number of citizens, among whom were some sailors, the North Americans took seats in the street car to escape from the stones which the Chileans threw at them. It was believed for an instant that the North Americans had saved themselves from popular fury, but such was not the case. Scarcely had the car begun to move, when a crowd gathered around and stopped its progress. Under these circumstances and without any cessation of the howling and throwing of stones at the North Americans, the conductor entered the car, and, seeing the risk of the situation to the vehicle, ordered them to get out. At the instant the sailors left the car, in the midst of a hail of stones, the said conductor received a stone blow on the head. One of the Yankee sailors managed to escape in the direction of the Plaza Wheelright, but the other was felled to the ground by a stone. Managing to raise himself from the ground where he lay, he staggered in an opposite direction from the station. In front of the house of Señor Mazzini he was again wounded, falling then senseless and breathless."

No amount of evasion or subterfuge is able to cloud our clear vision of this brutal work. It should be noticed in this connection that the American sailors arrested, after an examination, were, during the four days following the arrest, every one discharged, no charge of any breach of the peace or other criminal conduct having been sustained against a single one of them. The judge of crimes, Foster, in a note to the intendente, under date of October 22—before the dispatch from this Government of the following day, which aroused the authorities of Chile to a better sense of the gravity of the affair—says: "Having presided temporarily over this court in regard to the seamen of the United States cruiser Baltimore, who have been tried on account of the deplorable conduct which took place," etc. The noticeable point here is that our sailors had been tried before the 22d of October and that the trial resulted in their acquittal and return to their vessel. It is quite remarkable and quite characteristic of the management of this affair by the Chilean police authorities that we should now be advised that Seaman Davidson, of the Baltimore, has been included in the indictment, his offense being, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that he attempted to defend a shipmate against an assailant who was striking at him with a knife. The perfect vindication of our men is furnished by this report; one only is found to have been guilty of criminal fault, and that for an act clearly justifiable.

As to the part taken by the police in the affair, the case made by Chile is also far from satisfactory. The point where Riggin was killed is only three minutes' walk from the police station, and not more than twice that distance from the intendencia; and yet, according to their official report, a full half hour elapsed after the assault began before the police were upon the ground. It has been stated that all but two of our men have said that the police did their duty. The evidence taken at Mare Island shows that if such a statement was procured from our men it was accomplished by requiring them to sign a writing in a language they did not understand, and by the representation that it was a mere declaration that they had taken no part in the disturbance. Lieut. McCrea, who acted as interpreter, says in his evidence that when our sailors were examined before the court the subject of the conduct of the police was so carefully avoided that he reported the fact to Capt. Schley on his return to the vessel.

The evidences of the existence of animosity towards our sailors in the minds of the sailors of the Chilean navy and of the populace of Valparaiso are so abundant and various as to leave no doubt in the mind of anyone who will examine the papers submitted. It manifested itself in threatening and insulting gestures towards our men as they passed the Chilean men-of-war in their boats and in the derisive and abusive epithets with which they greeted every appearance of an American sailor on the evening of the riot. Capt. Schley reports that boats from the Chilean war ships several times went out of their course to cross the bows of his boats, compelling them to back water. He complained of the discourtesy and it was corrected. That this feeling was shared by men of higher rank is shown by an incident related by Surg. Stitt, of the Baltimore.

After the battle of Placilla he, with other medical officers of the war vessels in the harbor, was giving voluntary assistance to the wounded in the hospitals. The son of a Chilean army officer of high rank was under his care, and, when the father discovered it, he flew into a passion, and said he would rather have his son die than have Americans touch him, and at once had him removed from the ward. This feeling is not well concealed in the dispatches of the foreign office and had quite open expression in the disrespectful treatment of the American legation. The Chilean boatmen in the bay refused, even for large offers of money, to return our sailors, who crowded the mole, to their ship when they were endeavoring to escape from the city on the night of the assault. The market boats of the Baltimore were threatened, and even quite recently the gig of Commander Evans, of the Yorktown, was stoned while waiting for him at the Mole.

The evidence of our sailors clearly shows that the attack was expected by the Chilean people, that threats had been made against our men, and that in one case, somewhat early in the afternoon, the keeper of one house, into which some of our men had gone, closed his establishment in anticipation of the attack which he advised them would be made upon them as darkness came on.

In a report of Capt. Schley to the Navy Department he says:

"In the only interview that I had with Judge Foster, who is investigating the case relative to the disturbance, before he was aware of the entire gravity of the matter, he informed me that the assault upon my men was the outcome of hatred for our people among the lower classes, because they thought we had sympathized with the Balmaceda government on account of the Itata matter, whether with reason or without he could, of course, not admit; but such he thought was the explanation of the assault at that time."

Several of our men sought security from the mob by such complete or partial changes in their dress as would conceal the fact of their being seamen of the Baltimore, and found it then possible to walk the streets without molestation. These incidents conclusively establish that the attack was upon the uniform—the nationality—and not upon the men.

The origin of this feeling is probably found in the refusal of this Government to give recognition to the Congressional party before it had established itself, in the seizure of the Itata for an alleged violation of the neutrality law, in the cable incident, and in the charge that Admiral Brown conveyed information to Valparaiso of the landing at Quinteros. It is not my purpose to enter here any defense of the action of this Government in these matters. It is enough for the present purpose to say that if there was any breach of international comity or duty on our part it should have been made the subject of official complaint through diplomatic channels or of reprisals for which a full responsibility was assumed.

We can not consent that these incidents and these perversions of the truth shall be used to excite a murderous attack upon our unoffending sailors and the Government of Chile go acquit of responsibility. In fact, the conduct of this Government during the war in Chile pursued those lines of international duty which we had so strongly insisted upon on the part of other nations when this country was in the throes of a civil conflict. We continued the established diplomatic relations with the government in power until it was overthrown, and promptly and cordially recognized the new government when it was established. The good offices of this Government were offered to bring about a peaceful adjustment, and the interposition of Mr. Egan to mitigate severities and to shelter adherents of the Congressional party were effective and frequent. The charge against Admiral Brown is too base to gain credence with anyone who knows his high personal and professional character.

Recurring to the evidence of our sailors, I think it is shown that there were several distinct assaults and so nearly simultaneous as to show that they did not spread from one point. A press summary of the report of the fiscal shows that the evidence of the Chilean officials and others was in conflict as to the place of origin, several places being named by different witnesses as the locality where the first outbreak occurred. This, if correctly reported, shows that there were several distinct outbreaks, and so nearly at the same time as to cause this confusion.

The La Patria, in the same issue from which I have already quoted, after describing the killing of Riggin and the fight which from that point extended to the mole, says:

"At the same time in other streets of the port the Yankee sailors fought fiercely with the people of the town, who believed to see in them incarnate enemies of the Chilean navy."

The testimony of Capt. Jenkins, of the American merchant ship Keweenaw, which had gone to Valparaiso for repairs, and who was a witness of some part of the assault upon the crew of the Baltimore, is strongly corroborative of the testimony of our own sailors when he says that he saw Chilean sentries drive back a seaman, seeking shelter, upon a mob that was pursuing him. The officers and men of Capt. Jenkins's ship furnish the most conclusive testimony as to the indignities which were practiced toward Americans in Valparaiso. When American sailors, even of merchant ships, can only secure their safety by denying their nationality, it must be time to readjust our relations with a Government that permits such demonstrations.

As to the participation of the police, the evidence of our sailors shows that our men were struck and beaten by police officers before and after arrest, and that one, at least, was dragged with a lasso about his neck by a mounted policeman. That the death of Riggin was the result of a rifle shot fired by a policeman or soldier on duty is shown directly by the testimony of Johnson, in whose arms he was at the time, and by the evidence of Charles Langen, an American sailor not then a member of the Baltimore's crew, who stood close by and saw the transaction. The Chilean authorities do not pretend to fix the responsibility of this shot upon any particular person, but avow their inability to ascertain who fired it, further than that it was fired from a crowd. The character of the wound, as described by one of the surgeons of the Baltimore, clearly supports his opinion that it was made by a rifle ball, the orifice of exit being as much as an inch or an inch and a quarter in width. When shot the poor fellow was unconscious and in the arms of a comrade, who was endeavoring to carry him to a neighboring drug store for treatment. The story of the police that, in coming up the street they passed these men and left them behind them, is inconsistent with their own statement as to the direction of their approach and with their duty to protect them, and is clearly disproved. In fact, Riggin was not behind, but in front of the advancing force, and was not standing in the crowd, but was unconscious and supported in the arms of Johnson when he was shot.

The communications of the Chilean Government in relation to this cruel and disastrous attack upon our men, as will appear from the correspondence, have not in any degree taken the form of a manly and satisfactory expression of regret, much less of apology. The event was of so serious a character that, if the injuries suffered by our men had been wholly the result of an accident in a Chilean port, the incident was grave enough to have called for some public expression of sympathy and regret from the local authorities. It is not enough to say that the affair was lamentable, for humanity would require that expression, even if the beating and killing of our men had been justifiable. It is not enough to say that the incident is regretted, coupled with the statement that the affair was not of an unusual character in ports where foreign sailors are accustomed to meet. It is not for a generous and sincere Government to seek for words of small or equivocal meaning in which to convey to a friendly power an apology for an offense so atrocious as this.

In the case of the assault by a mob in New Orleans upon the Spanish consulate in 1851, Mr. Webster wrote to the Spanish minister, Mr. Calderon, that the acts complained of were "a disgraceful and flagrant breach of duty and propriety," and that his Government "regrets them as deeply as Minister Calderon or his Government could possibly do;" that "these acts have caused the President great pain and he thinks a proper acknowledgment is due to Her Majesty's Government." He invited the Spanish consul to return to his post, guaranteeing protection, and offered to salute the Spanish flag if the consul should come in a Spanish vessel. Such a treatment by the Government of Chile of this assault would have been more creditable to the Chilean authorities; and much less can hardly be satisfactory to a Government that values its dignity and honor.

In our note of October 23 last, which appears in the correspondence, after receiving the report of the board of officers appointed by Capt. Schley to investigate the affair, the Chilean Government was advised of the aspect which it then assumed and called upon for any facts in its possession that might tend to modify the unfavorable impressions which our report had created. It is very clear from the correspondence that, before the receipt of this note, the examination was regarded by the police authorities as practically closed. It was, however, reopened and protracted through a period of neary three months. We might justly have complained of this unreasonable delay, but, in view of the fact that the Government of Chile was still provisional, and with a disposition to be forbearing and hopeful of a friendly termination, I have awaited the report which has but recently been made.

On the 21st instant I caused to be communicated to the Government of Chile, by the American minister at Santiago, the conclusions of this Government, after a full consideration of all the evidence and of every suggestion affecting this matter, and to these conclusions I adhere. They were stated as follows:

"First. That the assault is not relieved of the aspect which the early information of the event gave to it, viz: That of an attack upon the uniform of the United States Navy, having its origin and motive in a feeling of hostility to this Government, and not in any act of the sailors or of any of them.

"Second. That the public authorities of Valparaiso flagrantly failed in their duty to protect our men and that some of the police and of the Chilean soldiers and sailors were themselves guilty of unprovoked assaults upon our sailors before and after arrest. He [the President] thinks the preponderance of the evidence and the inherent probabilities lead to the conclusion that Riggin was killed by the police or soldiers.

"Third. That he [the President] is therefore compelled to bring the case back to the position taken by this Government in the note of Mr. Wharton, of October 23 last * * *, and to ask for a suitable apology and for some adequate reparation for the injury done to this Government.

In the same note the attention of the Chilean Government was called to the offensive character of a note addressed by Mr. Matta, its minister of foreign affairs, to Mr. Montt, its minister at this capital, on the 11th ultimo. This dispatch was not officially communicated to this Government; but, as Mr. Montt was directed to translate it and to give it to the press of this country, it seemed to me that it could not pass without official notice. It was not only undiplomatic, but grossly insulting to our naval officers and to the executive department, as it directly imputed untruth and insincerity to the reports of the naval officers and to the official communications made by the executive department to Congress. It will be observed that I have notified the Chilean Government that, unless this note is at once withdrawn and an apology as public as the offense made, I will terminate diplomatic relations.

The request for the recall of Mr. Egan, upon the ground that he was not persona grata, was unaccompanied by any suggestion that could properly be used in support of it, and I infer that the request is based upon official acts of Mr. Egan which have received the approval of this Government. But, however that may be, I could not consent to consider such a question until it had first been settled whether our correspondence with Chile could be conducted upon a basis of mutual respect.

In submitting these papers to Congress for that grave and patriotic consideration which the questions involved demand, I desire to say that I am of the opinion that the demands made of Chile by this Government should be adhered to and enforced. If the dignity as well as the prestige and influence of the United States are not to be wholly sacrificed, we must protect those who in foreign ports display the flag or wear the colors of this Government against insult, brutality, and death, inflicted in resentment of the acts of their Government, and not for any fault of their own. It has been my desire in every way to cultivate friendly and intimate relations with all the governments of this hemisphere. We do not covet their territory; we desire their peace and prosperity. We look for no advantage in our relations with them, except the increased exchanges of commerce upon a basis of mutual benefit. We regret every civil contest that disturbs their peace and paralyzes their development, and are always ready to give our good offices for the restoration of peace. It must, however, be understood that this Government, while exercising the utmost forbearance towards weaker powers, will extend its strong and adequate protection to its citizens, to its officers, and to its humblest sailor when made the victims of wantonness and cruelty in resentment, not of their personal misconduct, but of the official acts of their Government.

Upon information received that Patrick Shields, an Irishman and probably a British subject, but at the time a fireman of the American steamer Keweenaw, in the harbor of Valparaiso for repairs, had been subjected to personal injuries in that city—largely by the police—I directed the Attorney-General to cause the evidence of the officers and crew of that vessel to be taken upon its arrival in San Francisco; and that testimony is also herewith transmitted. The brutality and even savagery of the treatment of this poor man by the Chilean police would be incredible if the evidence of Shields was not supported by other direct testimony and by the distressing condition of the man himself when he was finally able to reach his vessel. The captain of the vessel says:

"He came back a wreck; black from his neck to his hips, from beating; weak and stupid, and is still in a kind of paralyzed condition, and has never been able to do duty since."

A claim for reparation has been made in behalf of this man; for, while he was not a citizen of the United States, the doctrine long held by us, as expressed in the consular regulations, is: "The principles which are maintained by this Government in regard to the protection, as distinguished from the relief, of seamen are well settled. It is held that the circumstance that the vessel is American is evidence that the seamen on board are such; and in every regularly documented merchant vessel the crew will find their protection in the flag that covers them."

I have as yet received no reply to our note of the 21st instant, but in my opinion I ought not to delay longer to bring these matters to the attention of Congress for such action as may be deemed appropriate.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 25, 1892.

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

During the reading, the following took place:

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Evidently the reader has omitted or skipped a page. The part of the message that he is now reading comments upon a note communicated to Chile by our Government, and assumes that we are in possession of that note, but in fact it has not yet been read to the House.

The reading clerk turned back and read the omitted portion of the message.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message of the President of the United States just read, and the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed; and upon that I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was then agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 4636) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be printed and placed on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is as yet no Calendar. Of course, under the rules, the bill would be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but the rules not having yet been adopted, no Calendar exists.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But there will be a Calendar by the time this bill is printed.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Alabama ask unanimous consent for the printing of the bill and its reference to the Committee of the Whole House when that committee is organized under the rules.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I make that request.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve all points of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DUTY ON BARLEY.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution which I send to the desk, a resolution of the Buffalo Merchants' Exchange in relation to the reduction of the duty on barley, read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not quite understand what that document is. Is it a resolution presented directly by the gentleman from New York himself, or is it a communication from some outside organization.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. It is a resolution of the Merchants' Exchange of Buffalo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman from Iowa object to the reading of the memorial?

Mr. BUTLER. I object to its reading if that will spread it upon the RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. I object to the reading, Mr. Speaker. The time of the House ought not to be taken up with the reading of papers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOCKWOOD] has the right to have the memorial read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the Chair rule that memorials and petitions may be read when presented to the House? If so, I have one that I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that if they are received at all they can be read upon request.

Mr. DINGLEY. I take it for granted that we are acting under unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was not present when the order was made under which the House is now proceeding, but is informed that unanimous consent was given for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. DINGLEY. With the understanding that private bills and petitions were to go to the petition box.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If that be true——

Mr. DINGLEY. Therefore this paper can not be read except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Maine is correct as to the terms of the order, and that the understanding was that private bills and memorials were to go to the petition box. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LOCKWOOD] must therefore ask unanimous consent if he desires to have this memorial read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

Mr. DINGLEY. I object, unless the same is to be done with other memorials.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] objects, and the memorial will take the usual course and go to the petition box.

REPORT ON DISEASES OF THE HORSE.

By Mr. ALDERSON: A joint resolution (H. Res. 73) providing for the printing of additional copies of the special Report on Diseases of the Horse—to the Committee on Printing.

IMPROVEMENTS ON SAN JOAQUIN RIVER, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CAMINETTI submitted the following resolution; which was read, and, being considered by unanimous consent, was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives any additional reports, estimates, and maps concerning proposed improvements on the San Joaquin River, in the State of California, now on file with the Chief of Engineers, not included in the annual report of the Department of War recently submitted.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. YOUMANS. I ask unanimous consent to amend the title of a bill, there having been a clerical error in the printing of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUMANS] asks unanimous consent to amend the title of a bill. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2590) granting a pension to Mary J. Imhoff.

Mr. YOUMANS. There is a misprint in the body of the bill as well as in the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that this bill is now in the possession of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that the committee in reporting it can recommend any change which may seem proper.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has had this bill referred to it. The title of the bill does not correspond with the body; and therefore the bill was handed to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUMANS] that he might obtain from the House the privilege of amending it so as to obviate the necessity of a formal amendment by the committee. The name in the title is not the name in the body of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the orderly method of proceeding would be for the committee to report the bill back with whatever recommendation in the way of amendment they may think proper.

Mr. ENLOE. I suggest that the gentleman from Michigan can accomplish his object by reintroducing the bill in corrected form through the petition box.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly, the object can be accomplished in that way.

UNIFORM SPELLING OF GEOGRAPHIC NAMES.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to report back a concurrent resolution from the Committee on Printing, and ask its consideration now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 extra copies of the report of the United States Board of Geographic Names, transmitted to Congress by the President, December 23, 1891: 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for distribution by said board among the Government Departments, public libraries, and other suitable depositories.

The report of the Committee on Printing, which was read, states that the committee, after consideration, recommend the adoption of the resolution, and that the estimated cost of the proposed printing is $254.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the previous question is ordered, will my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] state what is the object of this publication?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to answer the inquiry of my colleague [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Early in the session the President of the United States transmitted to Congress a message informing us that he had appointed a commission on geographic names, the object being that this commission might pass upon and settle difficulties which have arisen in connection with such names. He also stated that the commission had submitted a report. This resolution simply provides for printing 10,000 extra copies of that report, at a cost of $254. It seems that there has existed considerable confusion in regard to certain geographical names, and the object of appointing the commission which has submitted this report was to obviate difficulties of that character. I ask that the message of the President of the United States upon this subject be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

My attention having been called to the necessity of bringing about a uniform usage and spelling of geographic names in the publications of the Government, the following executive order was issued on the 4th day of September, 1890:

"As it is desirable that uniform usage in regard to geographic nomenclature and orthography obtain throughout the Executive Departments of the Government, and particularly upon the maps and charts issued by the various Departments and Bureaus, I hereby constitute a Board on Geographic Names, and designate the following persons, who have heretofore cooperated for a similar purpose under the authority of the several Departments, Bureaus, and institutions with which they are connected, as members of said Board:

"Prof. Thomas C. Mendenhall, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, chairman.
"Andrew H. Allen, Department of State.
"Capt. Henry L. Howison, Light-House Board, Treasury Department.
"Capt. Thomas Turtle, Engineer Corps, War Department.
"Lieut. Richardson Clover, Hydrographic Office, Navy Department.
"Pierson H. Bristow, Post-Office Department.
"Otis T. Mason, Smithsonian Institution.
"Herbert G. Ogden, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.
"Henry Gannett, United States Geological Survey.
"Marcus Baker, United States Geological Survey.

"To this Board shall be referred all unsettled questions concerning geographic names which arise in the Departments, and the decisions of the Board are to be accepted by these Departments as the standard authority in such matters.

"Department officers are instructed to afford such assistance as may be proper to carry on the work of this Board.

"The members of this Board shall serve without additional compensation, and its organization shall entail no expense on the Government."

The report of the Board thus constituted has been submitted to me and is herewith transmitted for the information of Congress, and with a view to its publication in suitable form, if such action is deemed by Congress to be desirable.

BENJ. HARRISON.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 23, 1891.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DUTY ON BARLEY.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time resolutions of the Buffalo Exchange in relation to the duty on barley for reference. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions to reduce the duty on barley.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I desire that the resolutions be read, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the resolutions of the gentleman from New York will be read.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read at length and referred as above indicated.

THE RULES.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it was the purpose of the Committee on Rules to call up for consideration the report of that committee on the rules for the government of the House to-day; but so many members have expressed a desire that the matter shall go over until to-morrow, especially as a considerable portion of the day has been already taken up with other matters, that the committee is disposed to accede to that request; and if no other gentleman desired to introduce a bill or bring something forward for the attention of the House, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to suspend the motion for a few moments so that I may make a suggestion in regard to proposed amendments to the rules,

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw the motion at the request of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would suggest to the House that those members who have amendments to offer to the text of the code of rules proposed by the committee may be authorized to insert them in the RECORD, so that they may be examined by the House before we come to the discussion of the rules themselves. I think it would aid us to have these amendments published in the RECORD of to-morrow morning, and by that means turn attention to the various provisions and matters upon which there may be some discussion.

Mr. LANHAM. Do I understand the gentleman's suggestion to imply that these amendments shall be considered as pending?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would not like to go so far as that, for it might involve some parliamentary difficulties which I have no right to ask the Committee on Rules to assume.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the gentleman's proposition is entirely reasonable and proper, and we will probably not lose time in going forward with the work if his request is complied with, allowing amendments to be printed in the RECORD, when gentlemen desire to offer them.

Mr. McCREARY. I agree with the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Tennessee, believing that it would facilitate the business to have such amendments as will be proposed offered now and printed in the RECORD. I have an amendment I desire to present and would like to have it printed in the RECORD. I hope, therefore, the request of the gentleman from Kentucky will be granted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think there should be no misunderstanding as to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky. It is properly restricted to the mere printing of these amendments for information.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That was all.

Mr. McMILLIN. Because if they were permitted to be considered as pending, before the rules are discussed in general debate or the different clauses of the rules to which they apply are reached, it would cause confusion and delay, rather than expedition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would not think it courtesy to the committee to ask that the amendments might be considered as pending. I only asked that they be printed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. REED. I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I am informed by the document room that the rules have not yet been printed, and will not be, so as to be accessible to members, for a number of days.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That is a mistake. They have been printed already.

Mr. McCREARY. It is a mistake, for I have a copy of the rules in my hand.

Mr. REED. Then I have been misinformed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am informed that they have been distributed in the members' mail and will reach them this evening.

Mr. REED. Has a copy been printed with a comparison of the changes?

Mr. McMILLIN. There has been no copy ordered to be printed in that way. The request of the gentleman from Mississippi was for printing only, but did not embrace an order for a comparison of the changes made, and no authority was given to any one to have such printing done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that members who desire to submit amendments may present them now and have them printed in the RECORD for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The proposed amendments of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky are as follows:

Amend subsection 5 of Rule IX by adding, after the seventh line thereof, the words "or the accuracy of his count is challenged."

Amend subsection 12 of Rule XI by striking out of the first line of said subsection the words, "and the public defense."

Strike out so much of subsection 51, Rule XI, as is in italics, and insert in lieu thereof—

"It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, changing the rules or proposing action touching the order of business, and pending the consideration of such report but one motion that the House adjourn shall be in order, and such report shall not be adopted except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present."

Amend section 1 of Rule XV by striking out the following words, viz: "And thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair."

Amend subsections 4 and 5 of Rule XVI by striking out of each the words "to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn" and the words "to take a recess."

Amend subsection 3 of Rule XXI by adding: "And provided further, That whenever any general appropriation bill is under consideration it shall be in order to move as an amendment any amendment reducing taxation or providing out of what fund or taxes such appropriation shall be paid."

Mr. McCREARY. I offer the following amendment, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, as Rule XI, to be inserted next after the rule defining the duties and powers of committees, the following:

"It shall be the duty of the several committees having jurisdiction of the general appropriation bills to report said appropriation bills (except the general deficiency bill) within eighty days after the committees are announced in a long session and within forty days after the commencement of a short session; and if any committee fail to so report, the reasons of such failure shall be privileged for consideration when called for by any member of the House."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would suggest that the amendments need not be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated that the order permitted the amendments to be printed. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asked to have his amendment read.

Mr. LANHAM. I desire to offer the amendment which I have just sent up to the Clerk's desk, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be printed in the RECORD under the order heretofore made.

Mr. LANHAM. I want to have the amendment read.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think all of these amendments ought to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. LANHAM:

Amend paragraph 51, Rule XI, by adding:

"The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures shall have leave to report at any time on bills relating to the coinage of silver."

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a substitute for Rule X.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be printed in the RECORD under the order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I prefer that all these amendments sent up be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that an order was made a few moments since, by unanimous consent, that gentlemen having amendments to offer to the rules should have the privilege of printing them in the RECORD.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not object to that, but I think they should be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Subsequent to that order, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] offered amendments which they asked to have read.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I understand; but there has been no decision by this House against the reading of amendments which are offered to be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I say that the proposition which was accepted by this House by unanimous consent does not preclude any member from having amendments read when they are sent up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. OTIS] does not ask to have his amendment read.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But I do ask to have it read.

Mr. OTIS. I have no objection to the amendment being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. OTIS:
Substitute for Rule X:

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have certain proposed amendments which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman desire them read?

Mr. DINGLEY. No; I simply desire to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If no other gentleman desires to have them read I will renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] does not ask that they be read, but they will be printed in the RECORD under the order. The Chair will again state that gentlemen who have propositions in the nature of amendments to the proposed rules can have them printed in the RECORD by handing them to the Clerk.

Under the order above referred to the following proposed amendments to the report of the Committee on Rules were handed to the Clerk to be printed in the RECORD:

By Mr. DINGLEY:
Amend paragraph 6 of Rule XXIII by striking out the word "House" and inserting instead the word "committee."
Amend paragraph 7, first division, Rule XXIV, by striking out the words "and then other business on its Calendar" and inserting instead as follows: "; and then to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or, when authorized by a committee, to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a particular bill, to which motion one amendment only, designating another bill, may be made; and if either motion be determined in the negative, it shall not be in order to make either motion again until the disposal of the matter under consideration or discussion."
Amend by adding at the end of paragraph 2 of Rule XXIV as follows: "; but House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine."
By Mr. COBB of Alabama:
Amend section 3, Rule III, by striking out present provision and inserting the following: "preserve for and deliver or mail to each Member and Delegate an extra copy in good binding of all such documents printed by order of either House of the Congress of which he was a member which he may request in writing to be bound for him."
By Mr. BYNUM:
Amend section 6 of Rule IV by striking out and inserting as follows: In line 1 strike out the word "House" and insert the word "committee."
Amend section 3 of Rule V by adding the following: "and kept so until ten minutes after adjournment."
Amend section 5 of Rule XVI by inserting the following: After the word "order," in line 3, "except as above provided."
Amend section 4 of Rule XVI by striking out and inserting as follows: In line 1 strike out the word "debate" and insert the word "consideration." And by striking out as follows: In line 2, "to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn;" and in line 3, "to take a recess."
Amend section 3 of Rule XXI by striking out the following: "by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bills: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of a committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures."
Amend section 4 of Rule XXIII by striking out and inserting as follows:
Strike out the word "shall," in line 2, and insert the word "may."
Strike out all after the word "order," in line 2, and insert the following: "or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee, but bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors shall have precedence."
Amend section 2 of Rule XXIV by adding thereto the following: "but House bills with Senate amendments, which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole, may be at once disposed of as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House and not required to be considered in Committee of the Whole, may also be disposed of in the same manner, on motion."
Amend clause 3 of section 7 of Rule XXIV by adding the following proviso: "Provided, That on the first Friday hereafter, when bills on the Private Calendar shall be under consideration, bills reported by the Committee on War Claims shall be passed over and other bills be considered in their order; and on the second Friday thereafter, when bills on the Private Calendar are being considered, bills reported by the Committee on Claims shall be passed over and other bills considered in their order, and on each Friday thereafter, when bills on the Private Calendar are being considered, said committees shall alternate in the same manner in the consideration of the bills respectively reported by them."
By Mr. ENLOE.
Amend Rule XIII by adding the following:
"All reports of committees on private bills, together with the views of the minority, shall be delivered to the clerk for printing and reference to the proper Calendar, under the direction of the Speaker, in accordance with the foregoing clause, and the titles or subjects thereof shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD."
Amend Rule XXII by adding the following additional clause:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] renews his motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will withdraw it if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has anything to offer.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I simply desire to have a petition upon an important subject printed in the RECORD. I offer a petition of certain citizens of Mississippi, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning for the information of members, and I desire further that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It refers to the important subject of granting to authors certain privileges through the mails which are now granted to publishers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi that the petition which he offers be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I do not desire to have the names printed, but simply the text of the petition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUTLER. I object. I want it to take its regular course through the petition box.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is a very important matter, and the members of the House can not be informed of it except by the publication of it in the RECORD. It will occupy a very small space.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BUTLER] objects.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Then I will reproduce it in a speech I am going to make on the subject. I am going to get it into the RECORD in some way.

PRINTING OF THE REPORT OF THE BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION.

By unanimous consent, the following resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

By Mr. RICHARDSON: A resolution to print 500 copies of the Report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

By Mr. WAUGH: Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 2455) granting a pension to Prudence J. Mulvaney, and the bill (H. I ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of those bills, and that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions. They grow out of matters entirely pertaining to the Mexican war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] asks the discharge of the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the further consideration of House bills 2455 and 4320 and the reference of the same to the Committee on Pensions. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 728) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the city of Lincoln, Nebr., one-half the cost of constructing pavements in front of the public square owned by the United States Government in said city was erroneously referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1892.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DUPLICATION OF EXECUTIVE MESSAGES.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to call attention, and this time seems to be as good as any, to a usage which had been discontinued for some time, but which seems to be reviving again, and that is, printing in the proceedings of both Houses any executive message or other document sent from the executive department, which is entirely unnecessary, a waste of time and space, and a needless expense. I move that the Senate direct that when any message from the President of the United States or other document of length is printed in the proceedings of the House of Representatives it be not printed in the proceedings of the Senate on the same day.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, when it is printed in the proceedings of the other House it need not be reprinted in our record of the Senate proceedings?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, on the same day.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that is right.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly, that ought to be the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, which will take but a minute or two.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for the present?

Mr. HOAR. I will defer the motion.

MISSION INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication of 23d instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting an extract from the report of the Commission appointed under the act of January 12, 1891, entitled "An act for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California," and other papers relating to the exchange of lands with private individuals and the purchase of certain lands and improvements for the use and benefit of the Mission Indians, with draft of a bill to carry into effect the recommendations of said Mission Commission.

I have approved the report of the Mission Commission, except as much as relates to the purchase of lands from an exchange of lands with private individuals, which is also approved subject to the condition that Congress shall authorize the same.

The matter is presented with the recommendation for the early and favorable action of Congress.

BENJ. HARRISON.

JAMES CROOKS.

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, with accompaniments, in relation to the claim of the representatives of the late Hon. James Crooks, a British subject, against the Government of the United States, for the seizure of the steamer Lord Nelson in 1812.

The favorable action of the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses upon the bills heretofore introduced for the relief of the claimants makes it proper that I should recommend it anew for the consideration and final disposition of the present Congress.

CHEYENNE AND ARAPAHOE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, to report it without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the allotment, provided for in the agreement with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians in Oklahoma, ratified by act approved March 3, 1891, including the pay and expenses of the necessary special agents and necessary resurveys, which sum shall be immediately available and be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the purposes herein expressed.

Mr. DAWES. I will state to the Senate, if any one desires it, the reason for asking present action upon this bill.

At the last session it will be recollected Congress ratified an agreement with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians by which the Government purchased 3,000,000 acres of land to be added to the public domain. It was stipulated in that agreement that the residue of their reservations should be allotted to the Indians in severalty before the 3,000,000 acres should be opened to settlement, giving them the opportunity to select. In the agreement it was provided that $15,000 should be appropriated for the expense of the allotment. This was an estimate made by the commissioners who made the agreement without much knowledge of the necessary expenses. It involved the allotment of lands to more than 3,000 Indians, and on an investigation of the agreement it was found that the work was substantially a double allotment—it was an allotment of agricultural lands and also of grazing lands to each individual Indian. It was provided in the agreement that there should be distributed of the consideration money $250,000 to the Indians per capita.

The Indians insisted upon having that money before they took their allotment, which caused considerable delay. When the allotment was proceeded with and it was found to be a double work, the $15,000 was seen to be insufficient, not more than enough to do half the work. Under it 1,800 Indians have been allotted lands, leaving 1,500 still unallotted. The anxiety of the Department is to complete those allotments this winter as early as possible so that the 3,000,000 acres can be opened to settlement in the early spring for the benefit of the settlers; and therefore it is that there is anxiety to have this bill passed, if at all, immediately. It passed the House of Representatives last Thursday. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was Ordered, That the papers and documents on file with the Secretary of the Senate in the matter of the claim of B. F. Dowell be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

DEPRESSED PRICE OF COTTON.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by ——, with power to send for persons and papers, who shall inquire into the causes of the present low price of cotton and the depressed condition of agriculture in the States raising cotton; and also into the remedies, and report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, second, That the said committee may act in making said inquiries by one or more subcommittees, and that each of the members of the committee be authorized to administer oaths to witnesses examined by the committee or the subcommittees, and that said committee be authorized to employ such stenographers as may be necessary, and that the necessary expenses of said committee and subcommittees be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask for a change of reference of the bill (S. 1776) to constitute Newark, in the State of New Jersey, a port of immediate transportation. By an error of mine the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance. I find that the Committee on Commerce usually have charge of such matters, and I desire to have the reference changed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution to print 10,000 extra copies of the report of the United States Board on Geographic Names, transmitted to Congress by the President December 23, 1891; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 18) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PROHIBITION IN ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no further morning business that order is closed, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. DOLPH. Before proceeding to the Calendar I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments to refer to a matter that I think perhaps calls upon me for some remarks.

I received last evening a marked copy of The Voice, a newspaper published, I believe, in New York City, which is the acknowledged organ of the temperance people of this country, at least of the Prohibitionists. The article so marked is as follows:

SHALL WE DO THIS CRIME?—SENATOR DOLPH'S PLAN TO DEBAUCH AND ANNIHILATE THE NATIVE RACES OF ALASKA—THE GOVERNMENT ASKED TO LEGALIZE THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN ALASKA AND WIPE OUT AT ONE STROKE THE EFFECTS OF ALL THE CIVILIZING AND UPLIFTING AGENCIES THAT HAVE BEEN PUT INTO OPERATION IN THE TERRITORY—HOW THE PRESIDENT HAS POWER TO STRENGTHEN THE PRESENT PROHIBITORY LAW INSTEAD OF CONSENTING TO ITS REPEAL—A VIGOROUS PROTEST FROM A MISSIONARY AMONG THE ESKIMO AGAINST INTRODUCING LEGALIZED LIQUOR INTO HIS PART OF THE TERRITORY.

Senator JOSEPH N. DOLPH, the senior Republican Senator of Oregon, has introduced a bill in the United States Senate to legalize saloons in the Territory of Alaska. Alaska is now under a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors. Senator DOLPH'S excuse for introducing the legalized liquor traffic is that the prohibition is violated, and that it is better to repeal it and enact laws that will be enforced. It has been hinted, however, that there are personal and business reasons lying back of the one given by Senator DOLPH for this attempt to fasten the legalized saloon upon the rapidly developing Territory of Alaska. According to the report of United States Attorney C. S. Johnson, recently submitted to Governor Knapp, of Alaska, there are already in existence two or three breweries manufacturing and selling beer in the Territory for other purposes than those prescribed by the statutes, "while many persons are openly engaged in selling liquors contrary to law."

The license law proposed by Senator DOLPH provides that upon the application to the governor of any white resident of Alaska over 21 years of age and "of good character," and on filing a bond for $1,000 with the treasurer that the applicant will keep an orderly house and not sell liquor to Indians or minors under 18 years of age, and on paying $250, the governor shall issue to him a saloon license. It must also be made to appear to the governor that the applicant for license is a proper person to sell intoxicating liquors at the place mentioned in the application. License authorizes the sale of all kinds of intoxicating liquors on week days and between 6 a. m. and midnight, to be drunk on the premises, and their sale in quantities of less than 1 quart to persons other than Indians or minors under 18 years of age.

THE PRESENT LAW.

Prohibition has been heretofore the policy of our Government in its dealings with Alaska. In the act of May 17, 1884, "providing for a civil government for Alaska," section 14 reads:

"The importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said district, except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes, is hereby prohibited under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits. And the President of the United States shall make such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

Section 1955 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which under the above law prescribes the penalties for violating the prohibitory law, calls for the seizure and confiscation of "firearms, ammunition, and distilled spirits landed or attempted to be landed or used in any port or place in the Territory" in violation of law. And if the value of the same exceeds $400 the vessel upon which they may be found or from which they have been landed shall be forfeited, and any person willfully violating this law shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for not more than six months. Bonds may also be required from vessels departing from any port of the United States that they will not land liquors for unlawful purposes in Alaska.

Violations of the law are prosecuted in any United States district court of California, Oregon, Washington, or Alaska, and the collector and deputy collector of Alaska have the power to authorize any person to arrest persons violating the law and to seize vessels and articles liable to forfeiture.

There is, however, no injunction clause and no provision for abating saloons and breweries as nuisances, a feature found to be so essential to the successful working of prohibitory laws. But, as will be seen by the provision of the general prohibitory law above quoted, there is nothing to hinder President Harrison adding it or any other feature necessary to make the prohibition effective.

WHY PROHIBITION WAS ESTABLISHED IN ALASKA.

The Territory of Alaska covers an area of some 580,000 square miles, nearly one-sixth the size of the whole United States, and it has a coast line of many hundreds of miles. It also embraces some 1,100 islands and contains a population estimated at 33,000, including large numbers of native Aleut Indians and Eskimos. The difficulties of enforcing a merely paper prohibition over such a vast area will be readily appreciated, especially when it is further taken into consideration that the revenue officers appointed to guard the coast are only too willing to enter into collusion with wealthy parties interested in smuggling liquor into the Territory.

The principal object in the enactment of the original prohibition of firearms and intoxicating liquors in Alaska was to preserve the thousands of native Aleuts and Eskimos from annihilation by the rum traffic and to successfully preclude the dangerous element of intoxication in any native uprising. It has since been found that these natives, when kept away from intoxicating liquors, are of a remarkably mild and intelligent disposition, and are, under the uplifting agencies of schools and missions, making rapid strides toward adopting a civilized form of life. Governor Knapp, in his report, October 1, 1891, to the Secretary of the Interior, says of the condition of the natives:

"The change of conditions from year to year is not so marked as to call for special comment, but in the settled portions of the country, that is, along the coast and upon the islands, there is constant progress in civilization and improved conditions of life. The agencies at work for the uplifting of these peoples are effective and doing much good, while business enterprises, employing them as laborers and coming in contact with them in a business way, infuse them with civilized ideas. It is unfortunately true that bad ideas are also inculcated and immorality go hand in hand with civilization to such an extent that many good people become disheartened and incline to surrender to the discouragement.

"But there should be no such impatience. Their progress out of darkness and degradation towards the light of a higher civilization compares most favorably with the darker ages of the early history of Germany and England. They are surely coming, and only patience and perseverance and the coöperation of good people everywhere, and especially the aiding hand of Government extended as heretofore, but more liberally, in facilities for enlightened government and their education in good things, will tell upon them in the near future more effectually than before. * * * The people are peaceably and kindly disposed, reasonably honest, and have great respect for the Government. If spirituous liquors can be kept away from them lawlessness need not be feared and crime will be reduced to a minimum."

Here comes, then, in the face of these recommendations of Governor Knapp for still more Government aid and the coöperation of good people everywhere for the civilizing of the native Alaskans, Senator DOLPH'S bill to establish by law among them the destructive and barbarizing saloon.

Mr. President, I have given the editor of the Voice or the author of this article the benefit of the whole of it, and now I propose to examine it, alleging that it is the product of the densest ignorance in regard to affairs in Alaska, and is, in its reference to myself and to the customs officers in Alaska, scarcely less than malicious.

I will say in regard to Alaska that, as stated in the article, it contains an area of some 580,000 square miles. It has, including indentations, bays, and the shores of its islands, it is said, 25,000 miles of seacoast. The southern part of Alaska is composed almost entirely of islands. It is stated in this article that there are in Alaska over 1,100 islands. The line between Alaska and British Columbia is not well defined. The population of Alaska is stated in this article to be some 33,000. I think it is nearer 25,000 or 36,000, there being two or three thousand white and mixed people and some 33,000 Indians.

There are no roads in Alaska. The government of the district, as everybody knows, is the least complex and most efficient one that could be devised for the district. Owing to the great extent of seacoast, the great number of islands, and our long, poorly defined boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia, it has been found impossible to enforce the law to prohibit the introduction into the Territory and the sale and use there of intoxicating liquors.

I speak of what I know. Six years ago last summer I made a trip to Alaska. Again last summer I spent three weeks of my time in going to Alaska partly for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of the people of Alaska and the wants of the district. I have conversed with at least three governors, three collectors of customs, and two judges of the district and with other officials and many intelligent men from the district, and I now state that there is not perhaps under the sun among any civilized or savage people a country with the same population where there are so many saloons, and where so much liquor is disposed of, and where the disposition of it so demoralizes the inhabitants of a country as in Alaska.

Last summer when I was in Juneau, in Alaska, I was told by those who knew that there were twenty-two saloons in full blast in that little town, where all kinds of liquors were disposed of publicly, not to the whites alone, not to half-breeds alone, but to Indians and to minors. Anyone can buy there any sort of intoxicating liquor who has the money to pay for it.

The situation in Sitka, the capital of the district, was but little better. I was told that there were in operation right under the eyes of this governor, to whom I shall give my attention directly, under the eyes of the judge and the prosecuting attorney of the district, the collector of customs, and the marshal of the district——

Mr. PLATT. And the missionaries.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, under the eyes of the missionaries and the superintendent of education in Alaska there were fifteen saloons in full blast. I ascertained also that there was at Sitka a brewery in operation, another at Juneau, and another at Fort Wrangel. I believe Fort Wrangel was the place; at least there were three breweries in operation in the district of Alaska.

As is well known to members of the Senate, for some years, considering the fact that the district of Alaska was, until the admission of Washington, nearer to the State of Oregon than any other State in the Union, I have given some attention to affairs in Alaska. In the Senate, whenever a question has come up concerning the appropriation of money for the purpose of enforcing the laws in Alaska, I have been found advocating the appropriation. I have on several occasions called the attention of Senators to the condition of Alaska, to the necessities of the government there, and of the officers of the government, to enable them to enforce the law; and always, when it has been proposed to make or to increase an appropriation for the education of the Indians or the children of Alaska, my voice has been raised here in the interest of the largest appropriations and the most liberal treatment of the people of Alaska, and the rigorous enforcement of the laws.

But I ascertained from actual observation as well as information received from every officer in the Territory that the prohibitory law now on the statute book is a nullity, and the only effect of it is to prevent the importation into Alaska of intoxicating liquors through the custom-house, and the payment of duties. The utmost that can be done by the officers of customs there, is to seize, occasionally, a few bottles or a cask of liquor and confiscate it, while vessel loads are constantly smuggled into the Territory and cached in the woods and brought out in small quantities to furnish the saloons. Although there is upon the statute book a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors, and penalties provided for a violation of it, it has been found impossible to convict a person of selling liquor to Indians or to minors, or of smuggling liquor into the Territory or disposing of it there.

The people who compose the white population of Alaska are the class of people who find their way to the frontier, who live among the Indians, who go there to work in mines or to work in the fisheries. There are few temperance men among them, and they are opposed to enforcing this law. The result is, as I shall presently show, that it is impossible there to secure the conviction of any man who violates the law.

Now, this model governor of Alaska, who has been referred to in this article, and the district judge of Alaska, and the district attorney of Alaska, undertook last year to devise a plan to get some public sentiment back of them.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Senator proceeds to the other phase of his subject, I should like to ask him a question, with his permission.

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is his belief that the white population of Alaska is of such a character that juries can not be found within the Territory to enforce criminal laws generally?

Mr. DOLPH. I think I might answer that, without doing any violence to anybody, in the affirmative; but I wish to have it understood that there is to be a distinction taken between enforcing the criminal laws generally, such as relate to murder and arson and that class of offenses, and enforcing a prohibitory liquor law and enforcing penalties for a violation of the customs laws and regulations applying to the district. But I will say that it is impracticable. The white population of Alaska is scattered along the coast and is found in several small towns.

It is impossible to secure a jury which will convict, because under the law a jury can only be drawn from the particular locality where the trial is had for want of roads and transportation. It would not be possible to have a trial at Sitka of an offense committed at Juneau or a trial at Juneau for an offense committed at Sitka.

Considering the present character of the population there, there is no law on the statute books, nor can there be any law framed, which can be put into practical operation which will secure a jury in either one of these places that will convict any man for a violation of the law in relation to the importation into Alaska or the sale there of intoxicating liquors.

Recognizing this fact, as I said before, this model governor, according to the article in the Voice, and the judge and the district attorney undertook to devise a plan which would check the evils of intemperance. They assumed legislative power and authority to put in force a plan in that district, last year, by which they could obtain some backing, some influence that would enable them at least to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors to Indians or to minors. A public meeting of the citizens was called in Juneau, at which the governor was present, as I understand, and the judge and the district attorney. The result was that the governor of the Territory received applications for license in that district, and granted licenses to various parties to sell intoxicating liquors; but the license was no benefit to the licensees unless they could obtain some favorable action by the collector of customs.

The collector of customs is authorized to issue permits for the sale of intoxicating liquors for legitimate purposes, for medicinal and mechanical purposes in the district. They prevailed on the collector to so far commit himself to their plans as to issue licenses or permits to these men, licensed by the Government, to import intoxicating liquors for legitimate purposes, and he did so, but the amount imported under these permits was so large as to indicate the true purpose of the licenses and permits and the Treasury Department removed Mr. Procht promptly, although the district attorney and the governor still hold their offices.

Now I desire, as I think this matter deserves a little attention, not only on account of the article which I have quoted, but because the bill is before a proper committee of the Senate, to send up to the desk to be read a letter addressed to me by a very intelligent gentleman from Juneau giving an account of the arrangement made between the citizens of the district and the officers of the Territory during the last year.

I will first state that when I introduced the bill in question I made a brief statement. I gave the reasons which induced me to introduce the bill. I stated that I expected to be criticised, and that I was quite willing to take my share of responsibility in dealing with a matter with which I was perfectly familiar.

I should not ask to have this letter read, and I should not have said as much as I have said in regard to the officers of Alaska in relation to this matter, if the necessity for it had not become in my judgment apparent by the article to which I have referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

JUNEAU, ALASKA, August 15, 1891.

Senator DOLPH,
Portland, Oregon:

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request that I write you with respect to the matter of "liquor license and collector's permits" in Alaska, issued by Governor Lyman E. Knapp and Collector Max. Procht, respectively, and in order that Mr. Procht, the late collector, should not stand in an unfair light as compared with the governor, I desire to say that Mr. Procht was the last one to agree to the issuance of the liquor licenses and permits in question.

The proposition of the issuance of the liquor license first came from the officials; that is, it was generally understood that at the time the question arose, they were all in favor of it; however, I wish to state again that this was the general impression among the people here, for upon the very heels of this proposition, and while the United States district court was in session (during the month of January, 1890) at Juneau, Alaska, a written request was circulated at Juneau, and received many indorsers, inviting Governor Knapp to come to Juneau, there to meet the people and discuss this liquor license question.

* * * * * * *

The outcome of this invitation to Governor Knapp was the "citizens' meeting" held on or about January 24, 1890, at which meeting the governor (Knapp), Judge Bugbee, and United States district attorney were present. The substance of what transpired at this meeting was reported in the Alaska Free Press, a newspaper then published at Juneau, Alaska, a copy of which newspaper report is herewith inclosed.

Thereafter, it was understood that liquor licenses would be issued by the governor, providing Mr. Procht, the collector, approved of the arrangements, but Mr. Procht insisted upon a $500 license, and Governor Knapp favored a lower license since the parties interested thought $500 too high.

The governor and Mr. Procht, the collector, misled the people by intimating that they had the sanction of their respective Departments at Washington for this act, since the agitation of this question originated with the officials.

I will state that Mr. Peckinpaugh, the clerk of the court, positively refused to have anything to do with the matter, and earnestly protested against it.

* * * * * * *

While on a trip to Sitka I called upon the governor to see if the arrangements could be carried out as planned by the citizens' committee and the governor, but Mr. Procht remained until then obstinate and insisted upon a $500 license; when I then left the governor and called upon Mr. Procht with respect to this matter, and while Mr. Procht and I were engaged in conversation on the subject of what the amount of the license should be, Governor Knapp came into Mr. Procht's office, when I called him up to where we were and he then took part in the conversation, which was to the effect that he (Procht) should come down from $500 to $250 as a sufficient sum upon which these licenses should be issued and "permits" granted; but Mr. Procht would not then agree to it, but said "I'll see you at 9 o'clock this evening at my house, and in the mean time the governor and I will discuss the matter further," adding "I'm not favorably impressed with a $250 proposition."

I called at Mr. Procht's at 9 o'clock on that evening, when he told me that the governor had been so persistent that he felt disposed to give in, and that I might state to the Juneau people that the amount to be paid for the license should be $250.

The governor certainly understood the entire arrangement, and the fact that he would not issue the license unless Mr. Procht agreed to the amount is certainly conclusive.

The governor sent a copy of the application and the bond which he exacted from each applicant to keep an orderly house, etc., and requested that many copies be printed, which was done.

Inclosed find copies of "application" and "bond."

Mr. DOLPH. I send now to the desk to be read a copy of the account of this meeting of the citizens and the governor and the judge and the district attorney, as published in the local papers.

The Secretary read as follows:

CITIZENS' MEETING.

Pursuant to call, many of the citizens of Juneau met with the Territorial officials at the court-house on Friday evening last to discuss matters of public interest.

W. F. Reed was placed in the chair; John C. Heid, secretary.

Mr. Lewis stated the object of the meeting was to meet Governor Knapp and other Territorial officials relative to the question of regulating the liquor traffic in Alaska. Heretofore a license had been granted to persons to carry on the business of selling liquor, and the people wished to know what the new administration thought of the question.

Judge Bugbee was called upon to give his opinion on the question, and in substance stated that public sentiment was against forcing the prohibition clause——

Mr. DOLPH. Let Senators note what Judge Bugbee said about the enforcement of the act.

The SECRETARY—

and in substance stated that public sentiment was against forcing the prohibition clause of the organic act relative to the importation, manufacture, and sale of liquor in Alaska, and that the action of both the grand and petit juries of this term of court in the trial of such cases, involving the right to land and sell liquor, clearly pointed in that direction.

C. S. Johnson, district attorney, in giving his opinion of the liquor question, comparing the sentiments of the people of Alaska with those of the people of Iowa, stated: In Iowa it was difficult to enforce the law, since a large portion of the people were opposed to it; but here in Alaska it was practically impossible, since public sentiment was wholly opposed to that law. He did not believe that a license from the governor would under the law protect any one when selling intoxicants.

Governor Knapp, in his address, said that he had two views on the subject. First, What is to the best interest of Alaska? Second, To do what was right in a moral and legal sense respecting the question.

The only questions with him were what was best, what was right, or what could be legally done in the matter. He did not know how far his right went to issue a license to sell liquor. He would submit the matter to the officers of the law, and would be judged by their opinion. He would like to hear from the members of the meeting as to what would be a reasonable fee for a license. If a license could be granted, it would be his plan to exact a bond, etc. It was his wish to conform to the wishes of the people, as long as the proposed plan was legal and just, and expressed a wish to hear from the citizens on the matter.

Opinions were advanced by many present, following which Mr. Meyer offered a motion, which was carried, to the effect that a committee of five be appointed to present the question in a memorial addressed to the governor and signed by citizens.

The Chair appointed as this committee J. C. Heid, J. F. Maloney, S. Lewis, M. C. Orton, and F. M. Berry.

Motion made by J. C. Howard that Mr. Gee, timber agent, be requested to stop the cutting of timber on the hillside to the east of town was carried. Mr. Gee stated that he would do what he could in the matter.—The Alaska Free Press, January 25, 1890.

Mr. DOLPH. As I stated, Mr. President, the result of this meeting was that a license system was established by the officers of the district and that without any authority of law a license fee was required to be paid in and was received by the district authorities. A regular printed application and form of a bond were prepared and licenses issued. I send up to the desk the form of application required by Governor Knapp and the bond required upon the application for license to sell liquor, a printed blank.

The Secretary read as follows:

LIQUOR LICENSE BOND.

Know all men by these presents, That we, —— ——, of ——, as principal, and —— ——, of ——, as surety, are bound and firmly held unto the treasurer of the district of Alaska in the sum of $1,000, to the payment of which we jointly and severally bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators firmly by these presents.

Dated at ——, this ——, day of ——, A. D. 189–.

The condition of this obligation is such that if, under the license given said —— —— to sell intoxicating liquors, the said licensee shall at all times abstain from selling or furnishing the same to Indians and minors under the age of 18 years, and shall keep an orderly house, then this obligation to be void; otherwise of force.

Witness: —— —— [SEAL.]
—— —— [SEAL.]

APPLICATION.

To his excellency the governor of Alaska:

The undersigned hereby applies for license to sell intoxicating liquors in the city of ——, district of Alaska, under the regulations of the Government of the United States, for the term of one year. If this petition is granted I will deposit with the treasurer of the Territory a bond in the sum of $1,000 conditioned to keep an orderly house and refrain from furnishing such intoxicating liquors to Indians or minors under the age of 18 years; and will also deposit with said treasurer the sum of $250, the remainder of which, after defraying expenses, to be expended under direction of three street commissioners, to be appointed by the governor, in making and improving the streets and sidewalks in the city or town where my place of business is, the said money to be paid out by said treasurer on the order of said street commissioners duly approved by the governor. It is understood that the license will be revokable for cause without refunding the money paid therefor.

Dated at ——, this —— day of ——, A. D. 189–.

—— ——, Applicant.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, as I have already stated, this attempt to legislate for the district by Governor Knapp, Judge Bugbee, the district attorney, and the collector of customs, resulted in the removal of the collector of customs for his share in it; the governor and the district attorney are still retained, the judge has been removed, but not for that reason.

There is not a man of intelligence who lives in Alaska, and who favors the enforcement of the laws, who would like to see prohibition of the introduction into Alaska, the manufacture in Alaska, and the sale of intoxicating liquors in Alaska, enforced but who will agree that if that plan could have been adopted it would have been a great advance in the way of limiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the district of Alaska.

The white people who will have liquor there would have been able to obtain it, and the penalties of the bonds and the fear of the revocation of the license would have been sufficient to prevent the sale by them of liquors to Indians and minors, and to have secured orderly houses where the sale of intoxicating liquors was authorized. The liquors used by these establishments would have been regularly brought into the district and have paid duty in the district of Alaska; the people who were licensed, if I may use that expression, could have become a sort of aristocracy among the liquor-dealers, and their interest would have been to enforce the law in regard to those who might undertake to sell liquor without license to help the authorities to prevent the smuggling of liquors into Alaska and the unlawful sale of them. At least, it would have been an experiment well worth trying, but these officers of the district were assuming powers that they did not have, doing that which was illegal in the face of the statutes of the United States.

I do not care to prolong this discussion, but I desire to have read without stating the name of the writer a letter from a Government officer who has been recently in that district which will explain itself and will throw some light upon the question of the importation of liquors into Alaska.

The Secretary read as follows:

JANUARY 9, 1891.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senator:

DEAR SIR: I write you to-day to inform you of my safe arrival here, and of the condition of affairs in this distant country.

I find things in a very unsatisfactory shape, and I see no way at present to improve them. Smuggling has been carried on to such an extent that there is no longer any question as to obtaining liquor. The only trouble with dealers is how to find a market for the large surplus on hand. The operators have carried on their business so successfully that liquor can be bought for very nearly the same price as in Portland.

At first view this would appear to be the fault of the customs officers, but a plain statement of their methods will convince you that under existing circumstances our officers are entirely blameless. To begin with transportation.

We have no boat to cruise with, and it is impossible to secure one here, as there are none to be had except the frail canoes of the Indians, and, laying aside all danger from drowning, they can not be propelled with sufficient speed to capture a large-sized sloop or schooner.

After the liquor is landed and cached in different places the consumers are supplied in small quantities of from 5 to 10 gallons, which is immediately bottled and stored away in the different receptacles about the building. So any seizure by the officers of the law must and does appear insignificant when compared to the amount received and sold in the various towns of the district.

When I left British Columbia en route for this country I learned that a schooner was on her way up with 70 barrels of whisky. I notified the officers to keep a lookout for her, and after going to Sitka I returned here and awaited her appearance. On the evening of December 31 I learned that she was about 14 miles below town and would only wait until the next morning before leaving for the westward. Upon learning this fact I communicated with Mr. Ward, the deputy collector at this port, and we began our hunt for a boat to convey us down the bay to her anchorage. The weather was of such severe character that an open boat was out of the question, and the captain of the steam ferry between here and Douglas Island would not venture to the head of the island, and the only other boat had bursted pipes.

Thus you can see that after all my pains to gain information, and after we had tried until 4 o'clock in the morning, we were compelled to stand idly by and know that at least 2,500 gallons of liquor had escaped us and gone to a market that should be closed.

After meeting a few disappointments, can you wonder that we grow discouraged and feel that the importation of liquor can not be prevented by any individual effort of the officers here?

I share the belief of the officers here when I say that I think your bill for the admission of liquor to the Territory is the wisest course to pursue. But I have not yet seen a copy of the bill, but if it is in the shape I have seen in newspapers I would suggest that the bond be increased to a larger sum and that the permit system be continued to the extent of preventing all but licensed dealers from handling liquors, and these permits should be issued with a view to only allowing such dealers to have such quantity as would appear to the officer issuing the permit to be sufficient to supply the legitimate demand of his trade. This feature would prevent such loads going to the people of the westward as I have described in the body of this letter. In conclusion I will say that I believe the liquor business can be better controlled by the course you have adopted by your bill for the licensing the sale of it under certain restrictions than by any other method which can be adopted by our Government.

Mr. DOLPH. Now, Mr. President, here is a statement from an official source that shows how impossible it is for the officers of Alaska to prevent the smuggling of liquor into Alaska. There is a collector of customs at Sitka, many miles distant from the other settlements, without any roads or any means of communication with them, and no Government vessel at the command of the officers. There is a deputy collector stationed at Juneau and a deputy United States marshal, and there are deputy collectors or inspectors stationed at different points. The only Government officers at these points where most of the liquor is sold are a deputy collector, a deputy marshal, and a United States commissioner. Opposed to them is the entire community of whites and half-breeds and the Indians; and, as I say, liquor is publicly sold in all these places, and not only that, but the Indian women are brought into the saloons where liquor is sold, and dance houses are established, where they engage in dancing with the miners all night long, and quite possibly in worse practices.

All this is done under the eyes of the officers of the Government, and they are powerless to prevent it. A man is arrested and tried and the jury acquits him. A man is arrested occasionally and held to appear before the grand jury and a bill is ignored. If an officer of the Government undertakes to make it unpleasant for any of these liquor dealers he finds himself unable to secure the means of performing his official duties; he can not even hire a boat or a skiff in the town on account of the public sentiment.

The author of the article in the Voice which I have read is entirely mistaken in regard to the legal power of the officers to prevent maintenance of saloons and breweries in the district of Alaska. The law is sufficient. The establishment of breweries and the making of beer is directly in violation of the acts of Congress. If the law could be enforced any officer of the Government could suppress a brewery or a saloon. The sale of intoxicating liquors is a violation of law, and as the liquors have been smuggled into the district they might be seized by the collector or deputy collector; but if he should seize the few bottles which are kept on exhibition in a few hours they would be replaced, and if he persisted in making seizures he would never get out alive. That is the actual condition of affairs.

Now what shall we do? As I say, I have been twice to Alaska and I have looked over this ground. I saw that the prohibitory provisions in the laws relating to Alaska did not prohibit. I saw that liquor was smuggled in almost under the eyes of the officials in the Territory and that they were entirely unable to suppress the importation or the traffic in intoxicating liquors in Alaska. It would require that there should be placed at their disposal numerous swift-going vessels, that the number of Federal officials in the customs house in Alaska should be largely increased, that there should be at least a company of soldiers stationed continually in each one of these larger places where liquor is sold, before the law could be enforced, and then it would be evaded. I came to the conclusion that the only thing to do was to build up some sort of public sentiment against the evils growing out of this traffic in Alaska. I learned that the officials did undertake to put this plan of licensing the sale of liquors in Alaska into effect. I believe if we should license a certain number of the most respectable men engaged in the business and see that they imported regularly into the Territory liquors to be disposed of, giving them an opportunity to supply the demand which comes from the white population of the country, we should build up such an influence around the Federal officers of Alaska that we could prohibit the smuggling of liquors and their sale to minors and to Indians.

The measure I have offered I believe is the only thing that promises any good result in that district. I do not make this statement as a personal explanation on my part, not for the purpose of defending myself against anything said in the article I have read, because I am in the habit of doing what I think is for the best and taking the responsibility for it. But I thought some explanation of this matter was due to the temperance people of the United States.

Mr. President, I have had an interview with Rev. Sheldon Jackson, who is the agent of the Educational Bureau of the Interior Department in Alaska and who has charge of Indian education in that district. I do not know what he thought about it, but he made no suggestion that my bill proposing to license the sale of intoxicating liquors in Alaska was not in the interest of the enforcement of the law and would curtail the sale of liquor there and protect the minors and Indians. If he thought it would not, he failed to say so. The only suggestion he made to me, and he sent me a letter in that regard, was that the provisions of the proposed law should be confined to Southern Alaska; there is where the main white population is; a suggestion which I readily acceded to because I saw the propriety of it, and in fact I have only visited Southern Alaska. The condition of things I was proposing to legislate about was confined entirely to Southern Alaska. I immediately transmitted it to Senator PLATT, saying to him:

I repeat now what I said to you then, that the bill introduced by me was introduced to remedy evils which I saw, and if they are confined to Southern Alaska I have no objection to my bill being made applicable to that portion only of the Territory.

I have no personal interest in the matter. My only desire is to accomplish something of benefit to the people of that Territory.

Now, Mr. President, what have I proposed? The bill introduced by me has been grossly misrepresented in this article. In the first place I propose to do away with jury trials for the trial of these offenses, and before doing that I interviewed the Attorney-General and received a letter from him upon the legal questions involved.

Section 3 of my bill proposes:

That all violations, after the passage of this act, of chapter 3, Title XXIII, of the Revised Statutes, and of section 14 of an act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska," for which the penalty provided by law is, or under any act of Congress passed hereafter shall be, not exceeding $500 fine, or six months' imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, shall be tried by the court without the intervention of a jury.

Does that look much as if I was interested in the saloons and breweries of Alaska, and was trying to repeal existing legislation to prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors within that district? Then I propose to cure another evil which is more a matter of administration than of legislation.

SEC. 4. That hereafter no special tax shall be collected by the United States from any wholesale or retail liquor dealer, or any wholesale or retail dealer in malt liquors, or license to retail spirituous or malt liquors granted to any such dealer within the district of Alaska, unless such dealer has been designated in the manner provided by law to sell such spirituous or malt liquor for medicinal, mechanical, scientific, and sacramental purposes.

The Internal-Revenue Bureau has been issuing licenses under the internal-revenue laws to all these people who are violating the law in Alaska, and the provisions of my bill propose to put a stop to that. What else does it do?

Section 5 provides:

That it shall be the duty of the marshal and deputy marshals of said district, of the collector of customs, and all deputy collectors of customs and customs officers to seize and destroy all spirituous and malt liquor found in process of manufacture in said district, or offered, exposed, or intended for sale therein by any person or persons who have not been lawfully designated to dispose of the same for medicinal, mechanical, scientific, or sacramental purposes, and to forthwith report the same, with a statement of the time, place, and circumstances, to the collector of customs, if the seizure is made by an officer other than the collector of customs, and the collector of customs shall at once report all seizures to the Secretary of the Treasury. It shall be the duty of the marshal and of all deputy marshals when called upon by any customs officer to aid him in making any such seizure, and the marshal and any deputy marshal whenever he is forcibly resisted in endeavoring to enforce or aid in enforcing this section, or is by violence, threats, or menace prevented from enforcing this section or aiding in its enforcement, is empowered to summon and call to his aid any bystanders or posse comitatus of his district. Spirituous or malt liquors displayed or found in a saloon, brewery, or other place where liquors are offered for sale, shall be conclusively presumed to be intended for sale.

Does that look very much as if this bill was in the interest of the liquor-sellers of Alaska?

Mr. SANDERS. I should like to ask the Senator a question in this connection.

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS. I ask if it is impossible to get a jury upon their oaths to find according to the facts in the case upon testimony undisputed, what kind of a privilege is it to summon a posse comitatus from the same parties there from whom you would select a jury, and what aid would you be likely to get in the enforcement of the law?

Mr. DOLPH. I am glad the Senator has asked me that question. The Senator must understand that these provisions are to be considered in connection with another bill which has been criticised by the publication from which I have read. Those provisions are contained in a bill which is a counterpart of the bill which has been criticised. That bill provides:

That from and after the passage of this act, upon the written or printed application of any white resident of the district of Alaska over twenty-one years of age, of good character, to the governor of Alaska for a license to sell intoxicating liquors at some designated place in said district for a period of not exceeding one year, and upon the execution and presentation and filing with the treasurer of said district of the bond of the applicant, with sufficient sureties satisfactory to the governor, in the penal sum of $1,000, conditioned that the applicant shall keep an orderly house, and will not sell intoxicating liquors to Indians or minors under the age of 18 years, and upon the payment into the treasury of the said district of the sum of $250, to be disposed of as other moneys received for public dues in said district, the governor of said district, if it shall be made to appear to him that said applicant is a proper person to receive such license, and that a license should be issued to sell intoxicating liquors at the place mentioned in the petition, shall issue a license to said applicant, authorizing him to sell on week days and between 6 o'clock a. m. and 12 o'clock midnight only, distilled, malt, or fermented liquors, wines, or cordials, to be drunk on the premises, or in quantities of less than one quart, to persons other than Indians or minors under the age of 18 years.

SEC. 2. For any breach of the conditions of said bond, by keeping a disorderly house, by selling liquor to Indians or minors under the age of 18 years, for smuggling liquors into said district, or aiding or abetting such smuggling, for any violation of the provisions of chapter 3 of Title XXIII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or of section 14 of an act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska," as modified by this act, such license shall be revoked by the governor of said district, who shall cause suit to be brought upon said bond, the penalty whereof shall be considered and treated as liquidated damages, and the licensee shall in addition be liable to all the pains and penalties provided by law for such violation of the statute.

My object in introducing the bill is not to make the laws more liberal for the benefit of the people who desire intoxicating liquors in Alaska; it is because I wish to get something practicable, I wish to get something that can be enforced in lieu of something that is not enforced. I wish, in other words, to prevent the sale of liquors to Indians in Alaska, to prevent the very debauchery which is mentioned in this article. Therefore I have provided that the license shall not be to sell liquor to Indians or to minors, and that for any breach of the condition of the bond, if liquor is sold to minors, or if liquor is sold to Indians, if these parties engage in smuggling or in any way violate any of the provisions of the law on this subject, their license shall be taken away and the penalty of their bond shall be considered stipulated damages and shall be sued for and recovered.

As the law now stands no recovery can be had on such a bond, and no punishment can be visited upon anyone who imports or sells liquor in Alaska, and, as I have already said, my hope is to build up a good influence through these licensed saloon-keepers in favor of enforcing the law, with this modification in favor of preventing the sale of liquors to minors and Indians.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to interrupt the Senator from Oregon for a moment. I should like him to explain why he desires to abolish the right of trial by jury in his bill. From what I have seen of some of the decisions made by the judiciary of Alaska I do not think it would be very safe to put the rights and liberties of the people there entirely in their hands.

Mr. DOLPH. I will say to the Senator that for the rights and liberties of the people—at least for the interests of the Government and of the people who desire the good order and repose of the district—it would be far safer to repose the power in the hands of the judges of the Territory than of any jury that could be impaneled. I have already said that it is impossible to find any grand jury that will indict or any petit jury that will convict for an offense against these laws.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether it has ever been tried?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, it has been tried; and I have read here the remarks made by the judge of the district in a meeting of citizens called for the purpose of adopting a license system, in which he says the result of the proceedings of the trials before grand juries and petit juries at the term of the courts then in session in the town of Juneau had demonstrated the fact that the law could not be enforced.

Mr. FAULKNER. That was the law of prohibition, was it not?

Mr. DOLPH. That was the law of prohibition.

Mr. FAULKNER. That public sentiment did not sustain. But as I understand the Senator, he is assuming that under the law of license the public sentiment will sustain it, and if his view is correct I can not see the reason for the abolition of jury trial in such cases.

Mr. DOLPH. I have not gone so far as to say that I have thought public sentiment would be such in the district as that the jury system could be relied upon to enforce the laws. I have said the license system I thought would create such a sentiment as would enable the officers of the Government to enforce the provision which I have just read for the seizure and destruction of liquors in the district, and also for the importation of liquors. But the provision I propose in regard to the trial of these cases by a court is not unusual. I suppose the Senator from West Virginia knows that there are a large number of misdemeanors now tried by United States courts without the intervention of a jury, and the condition of affairs in Alaska is such, the great extent of the Territory is such, the population is so scattered, the means of communication and of travel are so few and so inadequate, that it is impossible under any existing laws, and will be for years, to secure a jury in that Territory that will enforce the laws on this subject.

Mr. President, I regret having taken up so much time.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes; I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KYLE. If it is not possible for the United States officers to enforce the present laws in regard to smuggling, how will it be possible to enforce the provisions of his bill in regard to the same thing?

Mr. DOLPH. The bill does not deal with smuggling at all. I have tried to explain to the Senate the fact that the reason why the laws are not enforced in Alaska is owing to the great extent of the Territory, an area of 580,000 square miles; to the great extent of seacoast; to the fact that Southern Alaska is composed of numerous islands, probably a thousand islands; the fact that the line between Alaska and British Columbia is still an uncertain and almost indefinite line; the fact that we have only a collector of customs, two deputy collectors, and a marshal and a few deputy marshals stationed throughout the entire Territory of Alaska without any Government vessels, without any roads, without any means of communication or of travel between one point and another; to the fact that the people who have gone to Alaska are not the class of people that go to the frontier for the purpose of taking up farms, engaging in agriculture, and making themselves homes, but people who have gone up there to trade with the Indians, to live with the Indians, and to engage in mining and engage in fishing. They are not people of the character from which you can select good jurors. Then they are so few and so scattered that at present it is impossible to obtain a jury by which you can enforce the penalty for a violation of any of the laws upon this subject.

I repeat, what I propose to do is to limit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Alaska, to secure the legal and proper importation of the liquors that are sold, to prevent, if possible, the sale of liquors to minors and to Indians. That was the idea of the officers of the Government in undertaking, without authority of law, to establish such a license system. I hope such a system will bring to the officers of the Government such support there as will enable them to enforce the law. Of course, if a man has paid his license and has given his bond to keep a respectable and orderly house, not to smuggle liquor, and not to sell liquor to Indians, and not to sell liquor to minors, he will have an interest in preventing his neighbor from smuggling and selling liquor without license and without bond to Indians and to minors. If such a license could be put in force, respectable people—if we may use that term in regard to this traffic—could be licensed under it. I think it would be beneficial in its results.

Mr. KYLE. May I ask the Senator also what is the white population of Alaska?

Mr. DOLPH. I have not the returns.

Mr. PLATT. Four thousand one hundred.

Mr. DOLPH. Does that include half-breeds?

Mr. PLATT. I am not sure about that.

Mr. DOLPH. I think, including Russians, Americans, all foreigners, and half-breeds, and all but the Indians, it is 4,100 for the entire district.

Mr. KYLE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the United States Government is powerless in the presence of 4,100 people, half-breeds and whites?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator must have misunderstood me very materially. No; the United States could appoint a thousand deputy collectors.

Mr. KYLE. I understood the Senator to use the word "impossible."

Mr. DOLPH. It could send up in those waters twenty revenue cutters; it could send up two or three regiments of soldiers to be stationed at different points, and the National Government could arbitrarily, by military force and by such force of Government officers, probably enforce the law; but it would take twenty vessels and a thousand deputy collectors to prevent the smuggling of liquors into that Territory and to keep whisky from the people of that Territory, and it would take a large military force as things now are to protect the officers of the Government if they attempted to enforce the law properly.

The Senator entirely misunderstood me. The Government is strong enough and wealthy enough to do it, but it does not do it and has not done it ever since 1868. This law has been in force, and this thing has been going on, and as I said when I opened my remarks, more liquor is sold to-day in the Territory of Alaska and the worst liquor, having a more demoralizing effect, than what is sold in any other place under the sun where there is no greater population than there is of Indians and white people counted together in the district of Alaska.

Mr. KYLE. Then, Mr. President, I understand the fault is not with the officers in Alaska.

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir.

Mr. KYLE. Or rather is the fault of the Government at home. The fact that we are not able to enforce the law——

Mr. DOLPH. If it be practicable to appoint a sufficient force to enforce the law there, it can be done, perhaps.

Mr. KYLE. I understand the object of the law at present in force with reference to Alaska, is the preservation of the natives of Alaska, which I think is a very wise provision indeed, considering the fact that the natives are to occupy that Territory and to develop its resources. I think that is a wise provision with reference to the preservation of those natives. If our present law is opposed with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors to Indians in our own States and Territories south of Alaska, why should the same provision be made to apply to the Territory of Alaska? I understand that the amendment which has been referred to, and which has the sanction of Rev. Sheldon Jackson, will restrict the operation of the law to that particular portion of the Territory which is the southern spur, so to speak, of Alaska, and includes the white population of that territory. That is a wise provision if this bill is to go through in its present form. But I do say, Mr. President, that in case it should go through with that provision, it makes that small neck of territory merely a storehouse where liquors are to be stored in saloons and where breweries are to be operated, and that the law will be a hundredfold more difficult to enforce with reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors to those Indians than it is at the present time.

I do not charge the Senator from Oregon with one wrong motive in the introduction of this bill, and I would defend him from any malicious attack such as that which has been printed in The Voice, to which he has referred; but, at the same time, I do think it is a mistake for us to stand paralyzed, as it were, and say that it is impossible to enforce a law of the United States Government in the presence of 4,100 people.

A parallel case to this would be the existence of Mormonism in the Territory of Utah. Liquor is a curse to any Territory, and the Mormon sin is also a curse to the Territory of Utah. The white population of Alaska want whisky sold in the Territory of Alaska. The Mormons in the Territory of Utah want polygamy to be practiced in that Territory. Both wants are similar. We have enacted upon our statute books laws relative to the suppression of polygamy in the Territory of Utah, and we are willing to back our declaration upon this point with the bayonet, if necessary, in order to see that the law is carried out. I claim that the same spirit should be exercised with reference to the enforcement of the law in the Territory of Alaska, seeing that there is so great a principle at stake as the preservation of its native inhabitants.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator from South Dakota to make a speech, but of course I am very glad to have heard what he has to say. I wish to say that the Senator who has just spoken has never made any greater effort than I have to ascertain the state of affairs in Alaska, nor has he the good of the natives of Alaska any more at heart than I have, and he does not place more importance upon the preservation of the native races in Alaska from contamination by the introduction and sale of liquor than I do. The object of my bill is for that express purpose. I have stated to him that since 1868 they have been more or less brought in contact with this thing. Liquor has been sold to them and they have been contaminated. I have repeatedly on this floor called the attention of Congress to the situation of the natives of Alaska, numbering from thirty-three to thirty-five thousand. They are at present no charge upon the Government; they are not upon any reservation: they do not receive rations. We make no appropriations for them except for the education of their children, and that is because there is no way of assessing the property of Alaska to establish schools. As I have said before I have always heartily advocated the appropriation of money for the education of Indian children in Alaska, and have offered amendments to increase the appropriations. If the Senator can point out any legislation by which we can enforce the law now upon the statute book in regard to the introduction and sale of liquor I will clasp hands with him and use my best efforts to secure such legislation.

After the Senator has been as long in the Senate as I have been he will understand the impossibility of securing such an appropriation as will be sufficient to supply the necessary number of Government officers in Alaska and the required number of troops there to enforce the law; and it is not going to be enforced otherwise. I will ask the Senator if you can not enforce such provisions in a thickly settled State of the Union satisfactorily how can it be enforced in a sparsely settled district like the district of Alaska, containing nearly 600,000 square miles and only a population of 4,100 of white and mixed blood? It is utterly impossible unless you maintain such a force in that district of customs officers and of military as is not likely to be sent there.

I do not care to prolong this discussion. I have talked already too long. I did not think when I arose that I would occupy so much time. But inasmuch as my motives have been attacked in this matter, inasmuch as misstatements had been made in regard to the provisions of my bill and the present governor of Alaska had been referred to as an authority as to what was required in Alaska, I desired to show what he had done and what he thought was the best plan to bring about some good results in Alaska by showing that he had endeavored, without authority of law, to put in force there the same system that I propose to legalize, only with better security against the smuggling of liquors and the sale of them to minors and Indians.

My position in regard to the temperance question is too well known for me to need to defend myself in this body. I have always believed, however, when you can not secure the best thing in theory because it is impracticable, you should aim to secure that which is practicable and can be enforced, and which will produce good results. With that statement I do not care to take up longer the time of the Senate.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, just one word I wish to say in passing, and that is this: There is but one institution, I believe, in the United States at the present time that knows no law. If the question be smuggling, there is force enough in the United States Government to suppress smuggling; if the question be Mormonism, there is force enough in the United States Government to suppress that; if the question be larceny or almost anything else, regardless of whether it may be backed up by moral sentiment or not, there is force enough in the United States Government to supress it; but there is one institution—and I wish to repeat it—that knows no law, and that is the liquor interest of the United States, which rides over State laws and Territorial laws, and which will ride over the law with respect to the sale of intoxicating liquors to the Indians in Alaska.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1487) to remove the political disabilities of John R. F. Tatnall; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HUTCHISON AND SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up House bill No. 28, which is on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the bill on the Calendar?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. A Senate bill on the same subject was reported yesterday and is on the Calendar. This bill has passed the House of Representatives, and it is of some considerable importance to the company desiring to build the road that it shall be passed at once. It will not occupy the time of the Senate longer than has already been taken up with the consideration of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that a similar bill has been reported in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. A bill in the same words exactly has been reported in the Senate. I desire in the room of the Senate bill to take up the House bill, so that it may be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate bill is No. 148 on the Calendar of the Senate. Is there objection to taking up the House bill at this time?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory." It proposes to amend the act approved September 26, 1890, by adding:

That said railroad company be, and they are hereby, authorized to extend and operate said road, telegraph, and telephone line with like powers and privileges and under like limitations and conditions as are provided in said original act, in a southeasterly or southerly direction from the terminus of said road under said original act, to wit: From its connection with the Santa Fé Railroad at or near the city of Guthrie, in the Territory of Oklahoma, or some point north of there within a distance of 20 miles to the southern boundary of said Indian Territory, at or near a point north of the city of Denison, in the State of Texas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate bill on the same subject, being the bill (S. 1023) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from the city of Anthony, in the State of Kansas, through the Indian Territory, to some point in the county of Grayson, in the State of Texas," approved September 26, 1890, will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

BOARD ON GEOGRAPHIC NAMES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which, on motion of Mr. MANDERSON, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed 10,000 extra copies of the report of the United States Board on Geographic Names, transmitted to Congress by the President on December 23, 1891; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for distribution by said Board among the Government Departments, public libraries, and other suitable depositories.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LEADVILLE, COLO.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 56, being Senate bill 1045, providing for the erection of a public building at Leadville. I desire to call the bill up out of order, because I expect to be called out of the city in the next day or two, and I very much fear that it may not be reached in its regular order and acted upon while I am here.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1045) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Leadville, in the State of Colorado.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 12, after the words "one hundred," to strike out "and fifty;" and in line 13, after the words "one hundred," to strike out the words "and fifty;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Leadville and State of Colorado, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $100,000, which said sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some information in regard to Leadville, its population, and the business transacted there.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I shall be very glad to furnish the Senator with the information. The gross post-office receipts of Leadville from 1879 to 1891 were $419,000; the net post-office receipts from 1879 to 1891 were upwards of $217,000; money orders issued from 1879 to 1891, $6,045,000; money orders paid from 1879 to 1891, $1,562,000.

Leadville has a population of some 16,000. It has produced in the aggregate something over $170,000,000 of the precious metals since 1879, and its average output was never so great as now.

There is a bill pending for the holding of the United States courts at Leadville, which I believe will pass. The need of a public building at Leadville is very great, and the income which it has brought to the Post-Office Department amply warrants and justifies the expense.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STENOGRAPHER FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] January 20, 1892, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer to report hearings before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was to strike out all of the original resolution and insert:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had before said committee in relation to bills proposing amendments to the "Act to regulate commerce," and bills providing for the adoption of automatic couplers and power brakes by railroads, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], on which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I regret the apparent necessity of taking the time of the Senate any longer upon this bill, but I was in the midst of what I tried to make as orderly a presentation of the matter as possible, and I gave notice that I would give way for the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] or the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] to-day if they desired to speak, but neither of them being present, I shall conclude my speech.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if he can give me any information as to whether this matter will probably occupy the remainder of to-day's session?

Mr. DOLPH. I am unable to state. I am informed that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] intends to make a speech on the bill. I had supposed that probably the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] might desire to say something upon it or the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], but I judge that neither one cares to speak upon it. I shall therefore conclude what I have to say in at least three-quarters of an hour and I shall condense as much as possible.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not desire that the special order set for 2 o'clock shall loose its place by reason of any abandonment of the bill during the session——

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of my colleague as to the nature of the special order set for 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands, if the Senator will permit, that the special order will be the next business in order after the disposition of the unfinished business, by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. Whether that shall be a conclusion by reason of the action of the Senate upon this bill or whether it shall be simply a temporary abandonment.

Mr. DOLPH. There will be no temporary abandonment of this bill. I intend to press its consideration until it is concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. May I inquire of my colleague what is the special order to which he has referred?

Mr. MANDERSON. The printing bill.

Mr. DOLPH. If no one wishes to speak after I have concluded I shall ask for a vote, but, as I have already informed the Senator from Nebraska, I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] desires to speak. I am not informed that any other Senator desires to speak upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, when I closed on last Thursday I had been reading from press copies of the letters written by the agents of the La Abra Silver Mining Company at the mines in Mexico to the officers in New York and from Mr. Garth, the treasurer of the company in New York, and had shown by those letters conclusively that for a year before the alleged abandonment of the mine, the officers in New York had refused to furnish any money to work the mines, had refused to pay drafts that were drawn upon them, had constantly instructed their agents at the mines not to draw upon them, and told them they must rely upon the proceeds of the mines in order to pay expenses, that the agents had been constantly asking for money, had been drawing drafts upon the officers of the company in New York, and had more than once notified the officers of the company in New York that unless money was sent the mines must be abandoned, and finally all the employés at the mines had been discharged; that is, no one was left at the mines but Exall and Granger, and Granger had left the mine and gone to New York.

I said that was sufficient under discussion, but upon reflection I think perhaps I ought to quote from some letters of Exall to Granger, written after he had arrived in New York and while Granger was at the mines, because Senators will recollect it was alleged in the petition, and stated in the testimony of the claimant before the Mixed Commission, that the Mexican Government had driven this mining company from their property about the 20th of March, 1868. Now, if I read letters from Exall subsequent to that time, written in New York to Granger, who was at the mines, that will show conclusively that Exall's testimony before the Mixed Commission in regard to this matter was willfully false. I have already read from a letter written by Exall to Granger from Mazatlan on the 15th day of March, before Exall left that seaport. I now read a short extract from a letter written by Exall to Granger at San Francisco on April 7, 1868, nearly a month after it was alleged that they had been compelled to abandon the mines. He says:

Since being here I have seen Ralston of Bank of California; he and I had long consultation, which resulted, in his opinion, that the affair had best be prosecuted in New York. I wrote you from M.—

That is Mazatlan—

in reference to my conversation with the German house in that place. Elder I have not seen, he and Belshaw having gone in the mining region to look after some mines. Cullins I saw once passing through the reading room of the hotel where I stop, American Exchange. I did not speak to him; don't think he saw me. I have determined to go on East; think it best I should do so, as the affairs of the company can and must be decided at once, and I can, from New York, get to M. in twenty days; so you see this is the speediest way to settle the thing. For God's sake keep everything in as good shape as possible, and in event we have to fall back on the property, it will be in such condition that we may be able to realize something from it.

That is, in payment of his salary and Granger's salary, which were unpaid for a year.

It is hardly necessary to give any further instructions, as I have previously written all that I could on the subject, and you, knowing as well as myself, must be guided by your judgment.

After he reached New York, and on May 8, 1868, two months after it was alleged the company were driven out, he wrote:

"MY DEAR GRANGER: * * *

Of course on the first day of my arrival here I saw nothing of the company. The day after I went down and saw Garth. Had a long talk concerning affairs, and, contrary to our expectations, gave me no satisfaction; didn't seem to intend to do anything more. I have seen him several times, but have got nothing from him of an encouraging nature. He seems disgusted with the enterprise, and, so far as regards himself, intends to do nothing more, or have nothing more to do with it. Well, I then went to see one of the stockholders and directors, who talked a little better. It seems there is a party here who has been after Garth and this stockholder mentioned, to sell the mines to a wealthy party who are now successfully mining in California. This party have been after these gentlemen repeatedly, endeavoring to get them to sell the mines, etc., they bearing all expense and giving the present company so much stock.

This party are not now in New York. One of them has gone to hunt up De Lagnel to get all possible information concerning Tayoltita, etc. In addition the party will pay up all debts against the company. From what this director tells me, they seem in earnest. They are not aware of my arrival; have been written to informing them of the fact, and I will probably be brought in contact with them before long. Now, as you and I are the principal creditors—I haven't been able to get a cent from them—"the company"—and the thing being in my hands, if this party intend buying, we can and will make a good thing out of it. Those of the company I have seen have turned the affairs over to me; so, in case anything can be done with this party, don't be afraid of your interests—all accounts at the mines are under my control—as yours will be looked to in conjunction with mine. All now depends on what can be done with this party, and more information concerning it I am unable to give until seeing them. I have informed the company that they shall do nothing until you and I were paid, which seemed satisfactory.

Telling him what he shall do with the mines, he says:

You can extend Ariza's "Guarismey" privilege "if he wants it" another 3, 4, or 6 months; don't extend Guadalupe's more than a month at a time; do the best you can under the circumstances, using your own judgment, being guided to an extent by what I have written.

I wish I could send you some means to get along with, knowing you must be having quite a rough time, but am unable. I expected to be paid up here; its not having been done plays the devil with my arrangements. Since my arrival here the weather has been exceedingly unpleasant; raining nearly all the time. New York is exceedingly dull; business much depressed; the political state of affairs of course has everything to do with it. Johnson is not yet impeached, and heavy odds are bet in Washington against the impeachment. Many changes have taken place since I was here last. Old friends I left, bookkeepers, clerks, etc., many are now doing business on their own accounts, but have a hard time of it on account of the state of affairs here. To-morrow I intend to take a run down to old Virginia, to see my folks. My mother and a sister are in exceedingly ill health; expect to be gone from here only a few days. I have now written all that bears on the important subject with us. Would write more definite, but, as you see, I am now unable to do so.

Then, on the 15th of June, Granger, still at the mine in possession, Exall, in New York, wrote him again:

DEAR GRANGER: In my letter written in May I informed you of the possibility of my being able to do something with the Abra affairs through other parties. (The old company manifest the utmost indifference regarding or in reference to everything belonging to or connected with their affairs in Mexico, and have virtually given everything into my hands.) I also informed you I would communicate with you by mail of the 1st of June, giving you something definite. This I was unable to do, which will show to you by reasons which I will give. After my arrival here I was informed that some parties had been here consulting with one of the stockholders in reference to purchasing their affairs in Tayoltita. This party, on my arrival, were in Philadelphia; so I was unable to see them. After remaining here some eight or ten days, awaiting them, I went to Virginia; remained there some days, when I was informed of the arrival in New York of the parties above mentioned. I hurried on immediately; it was then too late to write by 1st of June mail. Since being here I have seen these people daily, and have given them every information which would tend to make them think favorably of the property—given statements, accounts, inventories, indebtedness, etc., besides speaking as favorably of the property as possible.

Now, this was written on the 15th day of June, after they say they were turned out of the mine, when Exall was trying to get a company organized to buy the property and proposing to turn it over to them. He says:

The proposition of this company that is to be formed is to pay off you and I to start with, and give a certain interest to the old company. (The old company refuse to pay us our dues—

Underscored—

(The old company refuse to pay our dues, and we are totally unable to recover anything from them.)

Bankrupt, and Granger in charge of the mine!

I have given these parties a condensed summary of accounts of La Abra S. M. Co. I inclose a copy. You will see it does not—

Underscored—

does not accord with the books—

His account with these parties—but I gave it this way, as requested by the party who is endeavoring to start the co. An inventory of stock, as nearly as I could recollect, endeavoring not to go over the amount which I supposed on hand.

Then he says:

To be a greater inducement to these parties to purchase, and let them see I had confidence in the mines, at their request I have agreed to take in stock to the amount of $2,000, and have taken upon myself to act for you to the extent in stock of $850. This, I hope, will meet with your approval. Should anything occur, let your statements accord with mine. These parties leave for Philadelphia in a day or two, and will be able to report definitely in a week or two, when I will write you immediately, giving you all points in detail. I should not like these parties to come in contact with Green, Martin, or any one who would prejudice them, etc. If we can succeed, as I have stated here, we will be doing well as things are situated. Send me, as soon as possible, power to act for you. I can imagine your feelings away out in that damned gloomy place, and truly sympathize with you, and doing all in my power to get you away as soon as possible. Affairs here are very dull, little business doing. My health has been very much shaken since coming on; suppose it results in change of climate. The weather here has been, since my arrival, so damp, rainy, and disagreeable. Please do, as far as in your power, as I have suggested. The books don't let anyone see, for reason which will occur to you.

He did not want anybody to inspect the mines and find out what a bad condition the affairs of the company were in. Also, in the letter of July 18, Granger still at the mine, Exall still in New York, says:

Since writing my last I have seen the parties frequently, and have had long conversations with them in reference to raising this company and the payment of its indebtedness. The indebtedness to you and me they seemed willing to liquidate and take their chances with the rest. In my previous letter I instructed you in reference to the figures representing your and my amount; keep it as it is, but make no entry. This party have gone to work, and I believe will succeed in raising a company in a month or two. I have not been with them for the last week. My time has been spent partly in New York and partly in Virginia. Was in New York during Democratic conventions; an immense concourse of people assembled there to take part and see what was going on. The weather during the time was oppressively hot, almost unindurable. I arrived here on the 14th, and as I have nothing to do will remain here awhile. New York and in fact in all the States it is excessively dull, a complete stagnation of business. There is one other thing I did some weeks ago, as I thought I had best make as sure as possible about getting my pay. It was this: I entered suit against the company, not with the expectation of recovery just yet, but something to fall back on in case this company was not formed. Recently there has been a better show for raising the company than ever before. So I just let the suit remain over in a manner in which it can be revived at any moment. I want you to send me your statement and your power of attorney to act for you in case I found it necessary to continue the suit; if I succeed in recovering for self—could probably recover for you. The amount to be sued for is the just amount due me at $3,500 up to time of my demand on them in person for a payment and for my traveling expenses, etc. I will inform you in time to make proper entries, sending a list of expenses, etc. If I have to deal with a new company I want to get out of them all I can; if with the old one I must deal with them strictly. I will in time write you as things develop. By all means keep the mines secure, particularly the Abra—don't allow any one to touch the books or don't give any statements—these affairs are in our hands, and without satisfaction we must not do ourselves injustice.

It seems he sued the company in New York—

Remember that this letter was written in Richmond, July 18, to Granger in possession of the mine, while Mr. Exall swore that they were turned out of the mine about the 20th of March of the same year.

As to the alleged hostile acts of the Mexican authorities and people: The claimant's memorial, besides charging various specific acts, contains general charges of acts of violence, persecutions, and outrages by the Mexican authorities and people, which are alleged to have so alarmed the employés of the company and to have so interfered with the working of the mines that it became necessary to abandon them. If these allegations had any foundation in fact, some statements would undoubtedly be found in the letter-book and letters constituting the correspondence between the superintendent at the mines and the company's agents in New York to sustain them; on the contrary, this correspondence—

What I have read from it shows that this is a correct statement—shows that from the very beginning of the company's operations it was specially favored by the authorities. Bartholow, the first superintendent, reported to the New York office in a letter, a copy of which is found in the press-copy book, that owing to the war between the Mexican Republicans and the French, and the consequent interruption of business, he would not have been able to secure the transportation of the machinery and supplies except for the military protection and permits granted him by the Republican authorities.

That is from Mr. Bartholow, one of the witnesses who was examined to sustain this claim before the Mexican Commission.

He also, as it appears, resorted to the expedient of placing the hired mule trains in charge of Americans to secure their exemption from impressment.

That is to say, these mule trains hired from Mexicans were safer placed in charge of Americans than they were in charge of the Mexican owners. That is all it amounts to. I read from Bartholow's letter, page 239, a letter written from Hacienda, La Abra Silver Mining Company, Tayoltita, February 6, 1866, to D. J. Garth, of New York. He says:

I have succeeded in getting our business pretty well systematized, as follows: As above stated, Mr. Cullins has charge of mines and mining, and works his hands according to his own judgement, discharges any that do not suit, and no one has a right to instruct or interfere with him but myself, he being responsible to me alone. J. V. Hardy has charge of the store on pretty much the same principle; Mr. Griffith, William Grove (a new man from Saline County, Mo.)—

He was the man who was killed—and Dr. Hardy has charge of all the pack trains; each manages and controls a train; this is necessary for the reason that if some American in the employ of the company is not constantly with the trains there is great danger, if not a certainty, that the animals would be taken by the military authorities, and besides I could not get the Mexicans to pack for us unless I agreed to do this; besides, with this arrangement I have a guaranty that my men, animals, and effects will not be interfered with.

He says he has a guaranty that if he puts an American in charge of these hired packing trains they will not be interfered with. This is Mr. Bartholow. I was going to read on the same subject from page 240, but I will not stop to read that quotation. I read from the statement by De Lagnel, passing rapidly over it, found on page 108 of this report. Mr. Foster says to Mr. De Lagnel, who the Senator from Missouri says is worthy of all credence:

Q. I understand that your company was able to carry on your enterprise during the time of your superintendency without serious interruption?
A. Never had any from the Government.

That is Mr. De Lagnel, who is a truthful witness.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. At the time you left those mines did you see anything in the conduct of the Mexican people or Mexican Government to indicate that it was unsafe to continue operations there?
A. No, sir; when I left down through the country I could have come alone just as lief as with twenty men.

Now I read from the report of the committee:

Prorogues or special privileges and waivers of forfeitures, as to the working of the mines, were several times granted to the company by the authorities during the period covered by its operations. Suits instituted in the courts to protect the company's titles and rights were decided in its favor. Special indulgence was shown to the company respecting the exhibition and record of its title. The letters of the superintendents found in the letter book show conclusively that whatever difficulties occurred with the officials arose mainly from the inability of the company to meet its financial obligations. The superintendent wrote to the New York office October 6, 1867—

That was Mr. Exall himself whom I have quoted—

"There is no difficulty about the authorities, boundaries, or anything else concerning the mines or hacienda, provided there is money on hand, and money must be sent."

In the matter of prorogues I refer to page 280, a letter from De Lagnel to Garth, in which he says—now mark:

This—

Speaking of the Guaripamey mine—

This, as all other mines we hold, is secured by prorogues newly obtained.

That is, he has secured new prorogues, exemptions from working the mines for a definite time. All the mines, including the one under discussion, had special favors on the part of the Mexican Government. I also read from page 284:

The Guaripamey property I have secured until next January by prorogue, but I doubt whether I will be able to cover it after that date, as I suspect certain parties of being on the watch to denounce it, desiring to work it; therefore they will operate to prevent the grant to me of further indulgence.

But he had already obtained an indulgence from the Government in regard to that particular mine. I also read from page 288:

As I have already stated to you, all the mining property has been covered by prorogues up to January next.

All their property. They had received special indulgence from the Mexican Government and permits to keep their mines without working till the first of January.

I have already quoted from Exall's letter in regard to title papers, where he says they must be sent; that there will be no difficulty about the title; and also from a letter showing that there would be no difficulty about it provided they have money to work the mines and pay their employés.

I have a reference here to the testimony upon this subject showing that they were specially favored by the Government, but I shall not follow it, as I desire to hasten to a conclusion. I read from the report of the committee:

One of the specific acts alleged to establish the charge of hostility on the part of the Mexican authorities is the imprisonment of the superintendent, Exall. In his deposition before the Commission Exall states that he was arrested by the local judge; that without any form of trial or knowledge of offense he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, fined $50, and thrust into prison.

In a letter which Exall wrote to the prefect at San Dimas, the official superior of the local judge, a copy of which is found in the letter-book, all the details as to the causes of the arrest are set forth. His own account as there given contradicts his deposition, and shows that his detention must have been of a trivial character. The evidence does not show that he was actually imprisoned. It was an arrest under which he was detained for an hour or so, and was not of sufficient consequence to be mentioned in his correspondence with the New York office, and does not appear to have interfered with his duties as superintendent.

That is one of the main allegations of wrongful acts of the Government, and I propose to read from Exall's own letter an account of it in contrast with his testimony. It is found on page 317 of the report of the committee. I will ask the Chief Clerk to read that letter, beginning on page 316.

The PRESIDING OFFICE (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The letter will be read by the Chief Clerk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

C. JEFE POLÍTICO, San Dimas, Durango:

DEAR SIR: This morning about 11 o'clock Sr. D. Gicanor Perez came into the store belonging to the hacienda, looked around, saluted us, and then walked into the storeroom adjoining the store, the time I was behind the counter, and seeing him in there where no one was ever allowed without permission, I, in as polite Spanish as I was master of, requested him to come out, and after he came out I shut the storeroom door. He then asked me if I thought he was a rogue and wanted to steal. I told him, as well as I could, certainly not, and that the reason of my asking him out was that no one was ever allowed in there without permission. He then stated that he was there on official business, and wanted to see Matias (our ——), who was at the time working in the storeroom. I immediately called Matias out and he and the —— then went outside of the store. A few minutes afterwards he returned and talked in a very excited manner, feeling himself much insulted. I told him nothing was meant by what I had said, and he left and returned to ——.

At about 12½ o'clock, just as our dinner bell had rung, a mozo brought an order from the judge, which I inclose. After we had eaten, Mr. Slone went up to see the judge. He had collected around his house a number of men, and in the house preparations had been made as if resistance was expected and force might be required. After getting into his room I requested Mr. Slone to ask him, as I was unable to ask him myself, what was the business he wanted to see me on. He replied he had been grossly insulted, and pushed out of the store, when he was on official business. This I of course denied in a most emphatic manner, having acted only as before stated. I then told him that in requesting him to come out of the storeroom I had no intention of insulting him or hurting his feelings, but was simply enforcing the rules of the hacienda in not permitting anyone to go in the storeroom without permission. This he would not listen to, and persisted in saying I intended to insult him. I of course did not, and, from my ignorance of the language, could not argue the point.

After some time spent in talking to this effect, I asked him if he had gotten through with me, as I desired to return to the hacienda. He replied, yes; he had finished. Mr. Sloan and I then left, and bid him good-by. As we reached the corridor he said he never wanted to see me in his house except on official business. To this I replied, "Very well, sir," and turned to leave. He called me back, saying not to go; if I did he would send a force after me, and they would shoot, and insisted on my return into the house. I did so, without any remark. He then said I was his prisoner. I then requested him to know what was to be done. He said he would put me in jail until he could receive instructions from San Dimas. I remained passive, and he then gave full license to his tongue, abusing me in the most violent language. Then and several times I repeated my statement of the occurrence in the store. To this he paid no attention, and treated me with utter contempt, and persisted in his intention of putting me in jail until he could hear from San Dimas, and would listen to nothing that I might say. After being his prisoner for an hour, not being allowed to speak to anyone, and being guarded, I asked if he intended putting me in jail please to do so, as I had a headache and wished to lie down. He then gave me permission to go to the hacienda, but to consider myself still his prisoner, and at his house whenever ordered.

My dear sir, I have before given you as minute a state of events exactly as they occurred as 'tis possible to write, and from which you will see that if I have given any cause to Dn. Nicanor to imagine himself insulted, it was done ignorantly, as nothing was further from my thoughts than insulting him or hurting his feelings in any manner, and I submit it to your judgment whether I deserved the treatment which I have been subjected to, abused and insulted without any provocation and have no redress left me. But for being a prisoner I would come and see you in reference to the matter, but unfortunately necessity compels me to write.

Dn. Nicanor intends writing to San Dimas, and will of course give his version of the affair. Please act on this immediately, as I don't care to be any longer under restraint than possible.

Yours, most respectfully.

CHARLES H. EXALL,
Administrator La Abra Silver Mining Company.

TAYOLTITA, January 7, 1868.

Mr. DOLPH. It will be seen by this letter that Mr. Exall was requested to appear before the local judge; that he went and remained there an hour, and then inquired of the local judge if he proposed to imprison him. The local judge told him he could go to the hacienda, but to consider himself a prisoner; that he proposed to detain him until he could write to his superior officer in regard to the matter, and that appears to have been all there was of it; Exall was not confined, and he did not consider the matter of sufficient importance to communicate the fact even to the officers of the company in New York. I have read his own statement of the whole affair. I read further from the report of the committee:

The action of the local officials, Mora and Soto, is relied upon by the claimants to establish interference by the authorities in the working of the mines, and their orders to the superintendent were produced before the Commission. These orders show upon their face that they were occasioned by an alleged failure of the superintendent to observe his contract with the miners, by which they were to be paid two-thirds of their wages in goods from the company's store and one-third in cash. The failure to make the cash payment led to the interefence of the local magistrate, which was authorized by the Mexican mining laws.

The last of the orders or letters of the judge to the superintendent is dated July 10, 1867. In the letter book is found the answer of Superintendent Exall, dated July 11, showing that he was at fault in the matter in controvery, and that he had made a peaceable and satisfactory arrangement with the workmen. He closed his letter by expressing the hope "that with this there may be the most friendly understanding about this affair." The matter was reported to the treasurer in New York in a letter by Exall, dated July 13, in which he describes it as "a little spat with the officials which was gotten through without much trouble," adding, referring to the workmen, "we can do better with them when they are a little hungry." Subsequent letters, from Exall to the New York office, show that the company remained in quiet possession of the mines for at least one year after these orders, and that they had no influence in bringing about the abandonment of the property.

The orders may be found on page 360 of this report. This is an order issued from a court of justice in accordance with the mineral laws of the district, it is the order which has been relied upon to show that they were prevented from working the mine:

"2D COURT-CONCILIADOR,
"TAYOLTITA."

"To the Superintendent of the Abra Reducing Works:

"By the communication of yesterday, dated the 3d, received from the gefe politico of San Dimas, I notify you that if you do not intend to work the Abra mines as they were formerly worked, upon the system of "thirds," that you immediately vacate the mines, to allow the operators to work them on their own account, without further loss of time."

"Liberty and reform. Tayoltita, July 4, 1867.

"GUADALUPE SOTO."

Here is another:

"2D COURT-CONCILIADOR,
"TAYOLTITA."

"To the Superintendent of the Abra Reducing Works:

"The court notices, with the greatest displeasure, that twenty-four hours have elapsed since it addressed you a communication, to which you have made no reply You are ordered to arrange your work with the operatives within two hours; and if you come to no arrangement, you will vacate the mines, so that they may lose no more time."

The letters of the superintendent and the testimony taken show what the method of payment of these men was and that this was a mere interference of a court of justice to secure the rights of the laborers under their contract with the company.

I read from the testimony of De Lagnel, found on page 71 of this report:

By the CHAIRMAN:

* * * * * * *

Q. Before you proceed, what was your method of paying; what proportion of goods and what of money?

A. I think at that time I was paying them one-third of their weekly earnings in money; we did not pay them entirely in money.

Q. Before that time what was it?

A. It was half and half when I first arrived. But afterwards, on account of the reduction of the amount of ready money on hand, they agreed to take two-thirds of their pay in goods and one-third in money.

By Mr. FOSTER:

Q. And the goods were furnished by the store owned by the company?

A. Yes, sir.

I now read from Exall's letter to the public functionary found on page 303 of the report concerning this same matter:

TAYOLTITA, July 11, 1867.

To the Political Chief of San Dimas:

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant was received last evening, and from its contents I thought that no answer was expected, and I had no intention to reply to it. This morning I was advised that the answer was expected by you. In respect to the compromise of which you spoke, it was made while I was in Mazatlan, to last until I should return, and then I was to arrange with you as best I could. And if you had known the circumstances and causes which led to the paralyzation of the works it would have been apparent to you that it was not possible to do otherwise. I have offered to the operatives all the mines, to be worked on shares by the carga, and some are already at work, and desiring that with this there may be the most friendly understanding about the affair, I am, your most humble servant.

CHARLES H. EXALL.
Supt. La Abra S. M. Co.

That is the way that matter was disposed of, and in writing to the company, in the letter found on page 307, he says:

When I received your letter by Sr. M. I was working the Abra, Cristo, Luz, and Arryan, a small force in each. Seeing the decided manner in which all further aid for the present was refused and the injunction to cut down all expenses necessitated my stopping off the whole force from the mines. As I had only a short time previous reduced the cash payment from one-third to ——— (which occasioned a stop for eight or ten days, which I was glad of, as it was so much clear gain, and a little spat with the officials which was gotten through without much trouble), I thought it best not to stop off immediately, but prepare the miners for the change.

Then there is another allegation which I will not stop to read. They alleged a large amount of valuable ore was carried off. It will only be necessary in regard to that allegation to read from page 311 of the report:

There is no difficulty about authorities, boundaries, or anything else concerning the mines and hacienda, provided there is money in hand, and money must be sent.

And also from De Lagnel's testimony, on page 73:

By the CHAIRMAN:

* * * * * * *

Q. Did those Mexicans work faithfully?

A. Always, to my knowledge, so far as I know.

Q. They are a good set of laborers?

A. They were a quiet, good set of men. They are easily influenced, and when animated by evil-disposed persons or by some supposed grievance they are very bad fellows to deal with. On the other hand, if treated fairly and rightly they are amiable.

The same witness details in a long answer found on pages 72 and 73 that there was no robbery at the mines and that there was no ore carried off. The report says:

Another specification in the claimants' memorial is that "the authorities repeatedly seized mule trains of the company loaded with provisions and appropriated the same to their use." The superintendents—Bartholow and Exall—in their depositions before the Commission swore that the company owned large trains of mules engaged in transporting its machinery and supplies from Mazatlan, the seaport, to the mines, and that these trains were repeatedly seized and confiscated by the Mexican troops. One witness estimates the company's losses on this account at from $75,000 to $100,000 and another at $25,000. But there are only two seizures which are specified with any certainty by the witnesses before the Joint Commission—the one when George Scott, an employé, was robbed of $1,200, and the other when William Grove was murdered.

It appears from the letters, copies of which are found in the testimony of witnesses taken before the committee, that the company never owned any mule trains, but that all its transportation was conducted by hiring mule trains owned by Mexicans. When Bartholow, the first superintendent, turned over the mines and property to his successor the company only possessed twelve mules.

Those they used around the mine. This fact is shown by the evidences of the property on hand, the inventory of the property on hand at the time the mine was turned over from Bartholow to De Lagnel, or by the receipts given for it at the time.

It is also apparent from letters—

Those I will not stop to read. It is shown that they never owned a mule used in packing; that they hired all their packing done by Mexican trains, and as I have already stated, they put an American in charge of the train to prevent the seizure of the mules by the Mexican authorities, which might have been seized if they had been found in the hands of their own citizens.

Then comes a minute account of the robbery of Scott and the murder of Grove. I have already interrupted the Senator from Missouri to read the account of the murder of Grove as given in the letters, and in De Lagnel's letter as superintendent of the company written from the mine to the treasurer of the company in New York, from which it appears that Grove was murdered for his money by a person in the employ of the company, who followed him up for that purpose, and the Mexican authorities had him speedily arrested and tried, and while he was not convicted for that he was convicted for killing a woman and was shot. I will not take up the time of the Senate to read the testimony on that point, as I have already read all that is necessary upon it. The report says:

Prominence was given by the claimants before the Commission to a forced loan of $1,200, alleged to have been collected by a Mexican, Col. Valdespino, from Col. De Lagnel when he was superintendent, and it was also charged that $3,000 or $4,000 of illegal taxes were exacted while Bartholow was superintendent. The full correspondence of Bartholow with the Mexican tax collector and Gen. Corona is found in the letter book, and in inclosing copies to the treasurer in New York he says:

"The result was, instead of paying the amount of $3,000 or $4,000 as was demanded, we only paid about $30."

That is what Gen. Bartholow said in his letter to the company in New York. That is, on the taxes upon their property they got a reduction from $3,000 or $4,000 to $30.

The facts as to the forced loan of $1,200 are also fully set forth in the copies found in the letter book. Col. De Lagnel, the superintendent, wrote the day after he received the notice, July 28, 1866, to the military commander, Valdespino, and also to the prefect of the town, remonstrating against the levy, and informed them that he had no money with which to pay it, and sent, for the use of the soldiers, four pieces of cotton cloth as a token of good will; and that was the end of the affair.

They never pressed the assessment against them nor attempted to collect the tax. They received the four pieces of cotton cloth which were sent, and that ended the affair.

Col. De Lagnel was examined as a witness before the committee upon this subject and confirmed the statement concerning the matter appearing in the correspondence in the letter book.

Again I read from the report:

The assertion of the claimants that the letter book and original letters of the officers and agents of La Abra Company were in possession of Mexico, and might have been produced at the trial before the Commission, is not proved. Col. De Lagnel, one of the superintendents at the mines, testified before the committee that the letter book was left at the mines with the other books and papers of the company when he transferred the charge of affairs to Exall, the superintendent who succeeded him. Exall's letters, after he left the mines and went to New York, show that the books and papers were placed in charge of Granger, his assistant.

Two years after the abandonment Granger produced and delivered to the agent of the company sent out to Mexico to collect testimony to establish its claim, the only original records or papers of the company ever filed by it before the Claims Commission, and these papers Granger declared, in his deposition before the Commission, came into his possession as clerk of the company, and had not up to that date (May 14, 1870) passed out of his possession. The Mexican minister has stated to Secretary Bayard, in an official communication, that the letter book of La Abra Company and the original letters of the treasurer, Garth, and of the superintendent, Exall, were delivered by Granger to the Mexican Government in December, 1877, or two years after the award had been rendered.

It will be borne in mind not only that this testimony shows conclusively the falsity of every claim made before the Mixed Commission by the La Abra Company in regard to the interference with their working of the mine in Mexico or their being deprived of their property; shows that the claim originated in fraud; that all testimony that was pertinent to the inquiry filed before the Commission was fraudulent and false; and that our Government was imposed upon. There is another matter which should be considered. It appears that two hundred and forty thousand dollars and over has been collected of the Mexican Government and paid to these people. They have received now on this false and fraudulent claim as much money as they ever invested in the Mexican mines, paid in by the Mexican Government on this award.

By the bill now before the Senate for consideration it is not proposed to ask these people to refund that money. Probably it could not be collected. It is not proposed that our Government shall refund it to the Mexican Government. All that is proposed is that judicial inquiry shall be had to ascertain whether this claim is as fraudulent as it is claimed to be, and if it is, that our Governmeut shall return the money to Mexico which has not been distributed to the claimants, and if this award is found to have been properly made, that the money shall be distributed to the owners.

I do not think that I need to take up more time upon this bill. I have now made, I think, a sufficient statement to show every Senator who has followed me with any degree of attention that this is a fraudulent claim; that the United States was imposed upon, and that the honor of this country demands that something should be done looking towards the return of this money to the Mexican Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section three of the bill in the following words.

SEC. 3. That an appeal from any final decision in such cause to the Supreme Court of the United States may be taken by either party within ninety days from the rendition of such final decree, under the rules of practice which govern appeals from said court; and the Supreme Court of the United States is hereby authorized to take jurisdiction thereof and decide the same.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the absence of Senators from the Chamber during all the time of the discussion of this measure, involving more directly and more seriously the question of the honor and duty of the United States Government than any question that has occurred in the history of this Government for twenty years indicates, to my mind, either that there is a foregone conclusion in favor of our duty in the passage of this bill, or that there is a foregone conclusion against it; for after four Presidents of the United States and their Secretaries of State have earnestly recommended Congress to investigate this subject and to pass measures of the kind now pending before the Senate, and after the elaboration of this case through closely printed pages, amounting to more than 3,000 pages of printed matter, I can not conceive how there can be anything of indifference connected with the case, except that which results from a long consideration of it or from having heard for a long time that it was pending.

I should do myself a personal injustice and I certainly should not do the country or the Senate any service by attempting to go over even in a brief résumé all of the history attending upon the legislation in reference to these two awards or the evidence which it has been found necessary to consider in order to reach conclusions. I became connected with this matter by the reference of it to me as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations some twelve years ago, and then after a due investigation of it, but following only what the Senate and House had previously determined, being satisfied that it was my duty to present this claim to the consideration of Congress in a proper way, and that that duty was due more to the United States Government and to its honor and reputation than it was to the foreign Government, I have gone on laboring amidst all kinds of difficulties and amidst great embarrassments; and it has been only recently that I have had the active assistance of the other members of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is on my left, has always taken a prominent and earnest interest in this matter. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who has just concluded his remarks, against what I think were his original convictions on the subject, has become its ablest and best expounder, its most forceful representative on this floor.

The argument which the Senator from Oregon has submitted on the La Abra case, its history, and the evidence upon which the present action of the Senate is sought to be founded, is really unanswerable. It is made unanswerable by the fact that the witnesses who were brought forward to sustain this case in the outset have impeached themselves and have also been impeached by their writings and by their acts, proven by other and independent persons; and they have been impeached in a circumstantial way, so as to show a picture here before the country of the most daring and least excusable outrage upon justice, law, propriety, honesty, and decency that has ever been perpetrated in this country except one, and that is the case which succeeds it upon the Calendar.

What ought to be done in this case and in the case of Weil, which is to follow this, is simply a joint resolution or an enactment on the part of the Congress of the United States that the money which remains in the office of the Secretary of State or in the depositary of the Government resulting from this fund and not heretofore distributed shall be repaid to the Government of Mexico. We have not realized any interest upon that fund because it has never been invested by the State Department. Hence it would probably be improper that we should undertake to make any payment of interest compensation, for after all the Government of the United States is not to be blamed for its inattention to the subject, as will appear, I think, from a little recital which I shall make of the circumstances that attended the presentation of claims before that Commission.

But we ought really in justice to our own reputation and in justice to Mexico to vote this money out of the place where it is deposited into the hands of Mexico. However, we can not do that without assuming to the Senate of the United States and to the House of Representatives the impossible attitude of really understanding and considering all the facts of this case in the light in which they would be understood by a court of justice upon a full and fair investigation. It is not expected that four hundred and odd legislators will be able to inform themselves of the facts of a case like this, comprising that vast mass of printed testimony as to all of the particulars, so as to be able conscientiously to vote their judgment upon the evidence as judges as to whether it ought to be repaid or not.

Congress saw this when the matter first came to its attention, and it resolved that certain tribunals of the country might be resorted to for the purpose of arriving at a final ascertainment of the facts of these transactions, so that justice might be done and the honor of the Government of the United States might be preserved. Three functions of the Government were in contemplation of Congress at the time the fund was first sought to be distributed: the treaty-making power between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico; the judicial power of the United States as a Government, and the legislative power, by which we would either vote the money back to Mexico or we would confer authority upon one of the other branches which we alone can confer to consider the question and to finally decide it.

When this award was made there were a vast number of claims against Mexico and against the United States that were presented to the Commission, and I have not a doubt that the Commission did all they could to further the ends of justice in making their awards, nor have I any doubt that the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, did his whole duty in the examination of the cases. When the matter was submitted to him in consequence of a division of opinion between the American and Mexican commissioners for his final arbitrament, I have no doubt that he acted with the utmost good faith. At the same time I think it is quite evident that the learned minister did not comprehend the full legal situation and the full powers that the law entertained to take in review and pass upon the cause as it was presented to him and as it was sought to be presented to him in the motion for a rehearing which was submitted to him before his final award had been made, or at least before his award had been made final by his refusal to go into that matter.

I wish to read from Mr. Ashton's report, to show the Senate how it is that this matter was so embarrassed with difficulties while the Commission themselves were considering it. Before doing that, however, I wish to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to certain political situations at that moment of time that have now become historical in this country on the part of the Government of the United States and the Government of Mexico.

This convention was agreed upon on the 4th day of July, 1868. In 1865, in May, or June, we might say, our civil war had ended. We were trying as best we could to adjust the sad relations which had grown out of that great struggle amongst ourselves. The Austrian and French Governments had invaded Mexico about 1862, as I remember the time of the invasion, pending our struggle here, and their war continued about two years later than ours did, so that it was some time late in 1867 when Maximilian was captured near Queretaro, and was executed, and that war might be said to have come to a termination.

We all understand here the turbulence that existed in the United States among these well-established and ancient States of the American Union, and among the people who understand all about public and constitutional law and had every possible facility for readjusting their relations with each other, and where the conquering power in that struggle was so overwhelmingly triumphant as that all opposition to the Federal forces and Federal power of the United States was literally crushed out. And yet we had our struggles in courts and elsewhere of a most serious character in bringing back a proper readjustment of our political relations among these great States. Mexico, on the other hand, was shaken in every department. Her State governments had been more or less intermingled with the controversy between Maximilian and the Republic of Mexico; and I suppose that there was no country where a civil war could be said to obtain that was ever in a greater state of agitation and confusion than Mexico was at that time.

Mexico, forgetting the results and events of 1846 and the subsequent years, and feeling very grateful to the United States, as she ought to have felt, for the intervention of Gen. Grant and other distinguished men for the purpose of relieving Mexico against the pressure of a foreign power, readily entered into a convention with us for the settlement of all the claims of American and Mexican citizens reaching back to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. It covered all of that intermediate ground. Neither Government was in a condition to present those claims in that authentic form which our own law requires shall be done and which the diplomatic history of this country has proven so thoroughly should be adhered to and practiced in all such arrangements; that is to say, that each government in such conventions, always assuming to the other government its political responsibility to that government for whatever claims its people had against the foreign government—each assuming that obligation to the other, comes forward and becomes the claimant, the demandant for a settlement in such a convention. It does this in its own name; it does it upon its own responsibility. The award when made goes to the government and not to the individual whose equitable rights may be involved or may be the predicate for this action on the part of either government.

It is therefore a very essential regulation that the claims which shall thus be presented shall be avouched in such form as that the government presenting them shall be reasonably satisfied of their justness and equity. A claim must be submitted to the authorities of the government presenting it; it must undergo scrutiny and investigation, and after it has been put into shape in this way and the government presenting it is satisfied that is an equitable and just claim under the laws of the nation or otherwise, presents the claim in its own name, backs it up with the dignity of its own character. It presents its own officers for the purpose of prosecuting it, pays the expenses of the witnesses, and does all things that are necessary for the prosecution of that claim. When the award is made the award is made to the demanding government, and that government assumes to itself in all cases where the convention does not otherwise provide that it will distribute the award.

Now, in the political confusion that I have mentioned in both countries, it was above all things essential to the administration of justice in cases of this kind that each of these governments should have instituted this preliminary investigation and scrutiny into the various claims, which would result in the conviction on the part of each government that each claim in its essential merits was one that ought to be presented and demanded of the other government as a political governmental demand. We shall see how that matter was from the report of our commissioner, Mr. Ashton. I think the gentleman belonged to the State of Kentucky—J. Hubley Ashton.

These schedules exhibit, in a condensed form of course, the general nature and character of the claims referred to the Commission by the respective Governments, and the results of its labors in the investigation and decision of those claims; and they will doubtless be found very useful to the Department as means of obtaining ready information, from time to time, in regard to the action of the Commission in particular cases. There is also transmitted an index to the schedule of American claims by docket numbers.

The convention of July 4, 1868—

That is the convention whose mandate we are trying now to execute—was the second treaty concluded between the United States and the Mexican Republic, for the adjustment of private claims through the instrumentality of a joint or mixed commission.

The convention of April 11, 1839, provided for the submission of the claims of citizens of the United States upon the Mexican Government to a board composed of four commissioners, two appointed by the President of the United States and two by the President of the Mexican Republic, and, in case of their disagreement, to an arbiter or umpire appointed by and acting in behalf of His Majesty the King of Prussia.

Under that convention the Hon. William L. Marcy, and the Hon. John Rowan (the latter succeeded by the Hon. H. M. Brackenridge) were appointed the commissioners on the part of the United States, and Señors Pedro Fernandez del Castillo and Joaquin Valasquez de Leon the commissioners on the part of the Mexican Republic. His Majesty the King of Prussia appointed the Baron von Roenne to act as umpire in his behalf.

This Commission adjudged a number of the claims laid before it, but its time expired before the completion of its work, and the undecided cases remained unsettled until after the conclusion of the treaty of peace of February 2, 1848, known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Then it goes on to describe what the Government of the United States did under that treaty. I come now, omitting part of this narrative, to the following:

The convention of July 4, 1868, under which the late Commission derived its authority, was entered into for the purpose of adjusting the claims of citizens of the United States against the Mexican Republic, and the claims of citizens of the Mexican Republic against the United States, arising out of transactions of a date subsequent to the 2d of February, 1848; and the object of the convention, as declared by its preamble, was to "maintain and increase the friendly feeling between the United States and the Mexican Republic, and so to strengthen the system and principles of republican government on the American continent."

It may be here remarked that no convention we have ever yet formed with any foreign government has contained a declaration of a political sort such as I have just read from this record; but the affectionate relation, if I may so term it, between Mexico and the Government of the United States and the coincidence of principle between these two Governments was so strong as that the framers of the convention found it necessary to put in this remarkable statement as one of the purposes of the convention "to maintain and increase the friendly feeling between the United States and the Mexican Republic, and so to strengthen the system and principles of republican government on the American continent."

The jurisdiction of the Commission extended to all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the Government of the Mexican Republic, arising from injuries to their persons or property by authorities of the Mexican Republic, and of all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the Mexican Republic, upon the Government of the United States, arising from injuries to their persons or property by authorities of the United States, which may have been presented to either Government for its interposition with the other since the signature of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of the 2d of February, 1848, and which remained unsettled, as well as to any other such claims which might be presented within eight months from the day of their first meeting.

It will be observed here that it is only on the action of Government authorities, which means action by Government agents in Government employ and under the express or implied instruction of the Government on either side, that compensation is to be made by the awards to be rendered under this convention. Private claims against individuals of either Government are not recognized at all in those matters; a private citizen of the United States must go to Mexico and sue the citizen there in his own courts, and so conversely.

The convention provided that every claim should be presented to the commissioners within eight months from the day of their first meeting, unless in cases where reasons for delay should be established, when the period for presenting the claims might be extended to a time not exceeding three months longer.

That of course was by the action of the Commission.

These claims were to be impartially and carefully examined by the commissioners, and decided "to the best of their judgment according to public law, justice, and equity."—

The Senate will find these words occurring in the bill in this case—and the high contracting parties agreed to consider the result of the proceedings of the Commission "a just, perfect, and final settlement of every claim upon either Government, arising out of any transaction of a date prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the convention."

The jurisdiction of the Commission embraced, therefore, claims arising out of transactions subsequent to the 2d of February, 1848, and prior to the 1st of February, 1869, the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention.

The respective Governments agreed to give full effect to the decisions of the commissioners or umpire, "without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever;" and further engaged that all claims within the jurisdiction of the Commission, whether presented or not for its consideration, should, from and after the conclusion of its proceedings, "be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible."

One commissioner was to be appointed by each Government, and the two were to name some third person to act as umpire in cases in which they might differ in opinion, and if they failed to agree upon such person, each commissioner was to name an umpire, and the umpire in every case in which the commissioners disagreed was to be selected by lot from these two.

The convention provided that each Government might name one person to attend the commissioners as agent on its behalf, to present and support claims in its behalf, and to answer claims made upon it, and to represent it generally in all matters connected with the investigation and decision of the claims.

The commissioners and the umpire were required to keep an accurate record and correct minutes of their proceedings, and for that purpose to appoint two secretaries versed in the language of both countries to assist them in the transaction of the business of the Commission.

Such were some of the more important provisions of the convention of July 4, 1868, which was apparently framed upon the general model of the British and American convention of February 8, 1852, for the adjustment of private claims between the United States and Great Britain.

The Hon. William Henry Wadsworth, of Kentucky, was appointed the commissioner on the part of the United States, and Señor Don Francisco Gomez Palacio was first appointed commissioner on the part of the Mexican Republic. He was succeeded by Gen. Leon Guzman, who was succeeded by Señor Don Manuel Maria de Zamacona.

Thus it appears that at different stages of this convention the Government of Mexico had three commissioners succeeding each other.

The commissioners, after various conferences, named Dr. Francis Lieber, of the State of New York, to act as umpire.

Dr. Lieber having died on the 2d of October, A. D. 1872, the commissioners agreed upon the Right Honorable Sir Edward Thornton, K. C. B., envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, as umpire.

Joseph Hubley Ashton, esq., of Pennsylvania, was named by the President of the United States the agent of the United States before the Commission, and the Hon. Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, was named by the President of the Mexican Republic the agent to attend the Commission on behalf of that Government. Mr. Cushing was succeeded by Señor Don Manuel Aspiroz, and he, in turn, by Señor Don Eleuterio Avila, who continued in the performance of his duties to the termination of the Commission.

So Mexico had three assistants succeeding each other, and these successions were rendered necessary by acts over which the Mexican Government had no control.

The agent of the United States was assisted in the performance of his duties, at different times, by the Hon. William Marvin, of New York, and the Hon. Charles P. James, of Ohio.

Mr. George G. Gaither, of Kentucky, and Señor Don J. Carlos Mexia, of the City of Mexico, were appointed the secretaries of the Commission. Upon the resignation of Mr. Gaither, Mr. Randolph Coyle, of the city of Washington, was appointed one of the secretaries, and continued in the execution of his duties till the close of the Commission.

The first meeting of the commissioners occurred on the 31st of July, 1869.

That was more than a year after the treaty had been ratified or proclaimed.

At the expiration of eight months therefrom the commissioners, under the authority of the third article of the convention, extended the time for presenting claims to a further period of three months.

Mr. President, I will remark here as I go along that the complaint of the delay of five years' time occupied in the hearing of these various cases which came before that Commission is not justly lodged at the door of the Mexican Government any more than it is at the door of the United States Government, for the reason that Mexico seems to have suffered as the United States did in the loss and necessary replacement of her commissioners and her agents from time to time; and of course each succeeding man coming in had to familiarize himself with the whole of this vast docket, about which I am going to read now.

Soon after the organization of the Commission the claims and complaints lodged in the Department of State and in the American legation at the City of Mexico since the 2d of February, 1848, were transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Commission, and the cases were placed upon the docket of American claims. The greater number of American claims laid before the Commission were brought, for the first time, to the notice of the Government after the conclusion of the convention, and within the eleventh months allowed for the submission of claims to the Commission.

The American claims presented to the Department of State prior to the conclusion of the convention, and referred to the Commission at its organization, numbered 330, while the American claims brought to the attention of that Department after the organization of the Commission, and referred by the Secretary of State within the eleven months from the date of the first meeting of the commissioners, numbered 687.

The following is a statement of the number of claims against each Government laid before the Commission and the conventional period within which they were referred:

Period.	Against Mexico.	Against the United States.
Within the eight months from the first meeting, which expired March 31, 1870	894	908
Within the additional three months, which ended June 30, 1870	123	90
Total	1,017	998

In my letter of November 23, 1876, it is stated that the 1,017 claims on the part of citizens of the United States against Mexico aggregated, including damages and interest, $470,126,613.40; and that the 998 claims on the part of Mexican citizens against the United States aggregated the sum of $86,661,891.15.

It will be observed that neither the Weil claim nor the La Abra claim has as yet come in. They were filed without having been previously notified to either of the governments.

The convention of July 4, 1868, limited the period for the duration of the Commission to two years and six months from the day of the first meeting of the commissioners, which period expired on January 31, 1872.

By the subsequent conventions of April 19, 1871, November 27, 1872, and November 20, 1874, the time for the duration of the Commission was prolonged until the 31st day of January, 1876.

So that it took three additional conventions to cover, not merely the claims that had been presented under the original convention and in pursuance thereof, but to cover the enormous raft of claims that came in afterwards unindorsed and unavouched by either of the governments.

The convention of November 20, 1874, provided that, if the umpire should not have decided all the claims referred to him by the 31st day of January, 1876, when the functions of the commissioners would terminate under that convention, he should be allowed a further period of not more than six months for that purpose.

It appearing that the umpire would probably be unable to decide all the cases referred to him by the 31st of July, 1876, it was agreed by the convention of April 29, 1876, that he should be allowed a further period until the 20th day of November, 1876, for that purpose.

By the labors of the accomplished umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, all the claims laid before the Commission by the respective governments were finally disposed of within that period and the business brought to a close.

Though he did not decide all the cases by any means.

It is not surprising that the Commission required more than the time originally allowed for the completion of the task assigned to it. It was not until June 30, 1870, that its dockets were fully made up, and then they disclose the existence of over 2,000 cases to be investigated and decided. The area of time covered by these cases was over twenty years. The transactions involved in them had occurred principally in the territory of the Mexican Republic, where the evidence both for the claimants and the defendant Governments was chiefly to be obtained. The proofs were to be taken in two languages, those adduced by the Mexican Government being wholly in the Spanish language, and when presented they were to be translated into English for the use of the Commission

The documents accompanying the claims, when referred to the Commission, contained very meager information in regard either to the citizenship of the claimants or the merits in their cases. In very few instances had the claims undergone any examination previous to their reference to the Commission; and no case was ready for hearing, even on the part of the claimant, when it came before the Commission. It may be said that all the work of preparing the cases for hearing, as well on the part of the claimants as on the part of the Governments, was to be done after the cases were placed upon the dockets.

Justice to the governments defending against the claims required that they should be allowed time for investigating the facts and obtaining evidence in answer to the claimants' proofs; and after the presentation of the defensive evidence the same consideration rendered it proper that the claimants should be allowed some opportunity to file rebutting evidence.

It was unfortunate that no provision could be made for printing the records and the arguments in all the cases. The rules of the Commission required nothing to be printed except the memorials. The proofs and the arguments were in all cases, except the few instances when the claimants or the governments incurred the expense of printing, submitted in writing, and the commissioners, as well as the umpire and counsel, were obliged to study them in the original manuscripts.

The proof, if printed and bound, would no doubt have filled at least 300 octavo volumes of 600 or 800 pages each.

Now, think of that, 300 octavo volumes of 600 or 800 pages each would have been required to have printed and bound those cases and the testimony adduced in support and in opposition.

The Spanish proofs generally, and very often the English documents, were required to be translated before the cases were ready for submission.

As disagreement between the commissioners was the rule and agreement the exception, the decision of the umpire was invoked in a large proportion of the contested cases; and in all the cases referred to the umpire two separate and independent hearings occurred upon the proofs and arguments.

The commissioners deemed it proper, at the outset of their labors, to give reasons for their judgments and action in carefully prepared opinions, and this practice was followed by each of the gentlemen who acted as umpire. The opinions of the commissioners, and the umpire are recorded, and they will be found to contain valuable contributions to the law of international reclamations.

The functions of the Commission were suspended for a time by an occurrence which transpired shortly after Mr. Commissioner Guzman took his seat as a member of the Board.

Among the claims referred to the Commission by the Mexican Government were a large number of claims against the United States growing out of depredations alleged to have been committed in the territory of Mexico by Indians coming from the territory of the United States between the 2d of February, 1848, and the 30th of December, 1853, the date of what is known as the Gadsden treaty.

These claims were some 366 in number, and involved an aggregate sum of over thirty-one millions of dollars. They were founded upon the supposed obligations of the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, etc.

I need not go into particulars about those claims.

Mr. Commissioner Wadsworth and Mr. Commissioner Palacio, having failed to agree upon the questions involved in those cases, the commissioners, on the 8th of May, 1872, filed their disagreeing opinions, and referred the claims, upon the motion of the agent of the United States to dismiss them, to the umpire, Dr. Lieber, by an order duly entered of record, which also directed the Mexican secretary to deliver the papers to the umpire.

On the 24th of June following, Gen. Guzman took his seat as a member of the Commission, and the papers in these cases not having been delivered to the umpire, Gen. Guzman assumed the right, upon various pretenses, to interfere with the execution by the Mexican secretary of the order of the commissioners entered on the 8th of May.

After making every effort to maintain the authority of the Board and of the umpire, and to secure the objects of the convention, and finding Mr. Commissioner Guzman to be fixed in his determination to prevent the due execution of the order of the Board of May 8, and withhold the claims for Indian depredations from the umpire, and thus defeat the objects of the convention, Mr. Commissioner Wadsworth, on the 20th of July, 1782, filed his written protest against the action of his colleague, and referred the difficulty to the two governments, through their respective agents. The matter was adjusted by the withdrawal of Gen. Guzman, and the appointment of Señor Zamacona as commissioner on the part of Mexico.

Now we see at what time Mr. Zamacona came in there.

That gentleman took his seat as a member of the Board on August 19, 1873. Dr. Lieber having died before that time, the first duty devolving upon the Board, after Mr. Commissioner Zamacona became a member of it, was the selection of an umpire.

The selection was not made until October, 1873, when the commissioners agreed to name his excellency Sir Edward Thornton as their umpire.

It may be mentioned that, soon afterward, the leading test case in the class of so-called Indian depredation claims (that of Rafael Aguirre et. The United States) was submitted to the umpire, who rendered his decision, allowing the motion to dismiss the same filed by the agent of the United States; and, pursuant to that judgment, all the claims of that class were finally dismissed by the commissioners.

The following is a statement of the mode in which the cases upon the two dockets were disposed of by the action of the commissioners and the umpire and otherwise:

Action.	American docket.	Mexican docket.
Number of cases decided by concurrence of Commissioners Wadsworth and Palacio	227	314
Number of cases decided by concurrence of Commissioners Wadsworth and Guzman	0	0
Number of cases decided by concurrence of Commissioners Wadsworth and Zamacona	353	594
Number of cases decided by Dr. Lieber, as umpire	29	15
Number of cases decided by Sir Edward Thornton, as umpire	398	62
Number of cases consolidated with other cases	12	13
Number of cases withdrawn as arising too late, or for other reasons	7	0
Total	1,017	998

I need not go any further into the particulars about the manner of the disposal of these claims or the length of time that it required to dispose of them. The point I make is, that in the very nature of the practice before that Commission and of the circumstances by which the Commission was surrounded, no door of invitation to fraud and perjury was ever so widely thrown open as that, especially when these commissioners had no authority to act, except under rules of general international jurisprudence, I may call it, and international practice, under which no commission is issued to take depositions, and in respect of which no Government that I have as yet heard of has made a provision that the commission of perjury should be a punishable offense.

The case is taken upon ex parte testimony entirely, and in the situation that Mexico and the United States were in at that time it seemed as if this vast raft of claims that piled up there, a portion of them through the Departments but a very large mass of them without any prior investigation at all, were the mere fruits of an invitation to make a raid upon justice, and law, and equity, and honor, and duty, and propriety, for the purpose of getting out of either government, as the case might be, money that otherwise could never have been realized, and a great deal of which was never due.

But, Mr. President, under such conditions and circumstances, is the argument a sound one, is the reasoning just that Mexico should have been able to present her case before those commissioners in reply to the demand of the La Abra Company and of Weil in the same form and with the same guaranties for justice that she would in an American court or in a Mexican court conducted according to the principles of ordinary jurisprudence, either under the civil law, or the common law, or the statute law?

It is perfectly apparent that when, under such circumstances, a bona fide claim of injustice is brought forward to the consideration of the government in whose favor the judgment is rendered that government must scrutinize it to see whether, under all the circumstances, this broad and lax indulgence for the presentation of claims has been availed of by men who used the sacred name of the Government for the purpose of presenting an unjust demand against a sister government.

We have a great deal to say in our diplomatic correspondence and elsewhere about the sanctity of the action of these conventions. That is all right. The Government must abide by these conventions, whether they are right or whether they are wrong, until it is made to appear that through the instrumentality of the opposing Government, the demand of Mexico, we will say, for instance, against the United States is made apparently such a just demand that the Government should investigate to see whether fraud had intervened.

This principle is not at all new with us. We have had several cases. We had one with Brazil of a marked character. We had another with Venezuela of a little later date, I believe, of a still more marked character; in the latter case, the complaint being not merely that the evidence itself was false, but that the commissioners had been tinged, and that injustice had entered through bribery into the action of the Commission itself. We had a very hard effort to overcome the lobbyists in those cases, but we lost no time in ascertaining what justice required, and in the name of the honor and reputation of this great Government, at once asserting what was right and just to be done; and after so long a time, after very great effort, we finally succeeded in making restitution and in demanding restitution also in those cases so as to put the Government of this country and the Governments of Brazil and Venezuela in those cases to which I refer upon such ground as that thereafter they could not impeach the action of the Commission or the justice and propriety of their findings.

When the Gardiner case came up, that arose under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. That, as I have shown here, was a treaty for the adjustment of claims, in that part of it, which had existed prior to that time for a great many years between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico in behalf of their citizens respectively. The claims that the people of the United States had against Mexico amounted to the round sum, we will say, of three and a half million dollars. I have not the exact figures, but that is about the amount; and the Government would assume not exceeding that amount of money to be paid to its own citizens after an investigation by a joint commission between Mexico and the United States as to the merits of those claims.

That was rather a peculiar element to draw into the controversy, I may call it, for after the Government of the United States had assumed to pay all the demands of our citizens against the Government of Mexico, she still coöperated with the Government of Mexico in the organization and conduct of the Commission for deciding upon the merits and justice of these claims. So under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the Mexican commissioners had as much to do with deciding upon the justice, for instance, of the Gardiner claim as we had; and it might have been supposed that after that time the Mexican Government would continue to have an interest in the question whether the Gardiner claim was an honest one or whether it had been fraudulently presented and carried through. The Commission closed. Gardiner in pursuance of the award of the arbitrators drew his money.

It was a million dollars, I believe, a very large sum of money, that he got upon the ground that he had a mine in Mexico; that he had been badly treated about it; that he had been driven out; that his property had been confiscated; that he had sustained great damage through the instrumentality and intervention of the Mexican citizens in respect of his mine and thereby great losses had been incurred by him, which the Commission heard upon the testimony adduced by him, and they decided in his favor, and the Government of the United States paid over the money. Corcoran & Riggs got a large part of it, some hundreds of thousands of dollars, and other large portions of it were paid out into the hands of different American citizens to whom Gardiner was actually indebted. Some of it was paid to counsel, and so on.

The Government of the United States, however, became apprised of the fact that Gardiner had by false testimony obtained an award from the joint American and Mexican Commission, and thereupon the Government of the United States, without waiting for an act of Congress, upon its right to recover that money fraudulently obtained from it under any circumstances, brought its bill in equity in the courts of New York for the purpose of reaching not merely the fund that might be remaining in the hands of Gardiner, but also funds that had passed into the hands of his assignees, who claimed that they were innocent and bona fide assignees. A decree was rendered in favor of the Government of the United States in those cases. Corcoran & Riggs, finding the effect of the decree, and seeing the force of the evidence, came in voluntarily and returned their money to the Government. What they lost by it I do not know. They must have lost very largely. An indictment was preferred under the laws of the United States, not enacted specially for the case, for obtaining this money by fraud and perjury and false pretense from the Treasury of the United States, and pending that Gardiner went out and committed suicide to get rid of the proceeding, and that wound up the case.

There is a case in point. If it is not a case in point I fail to perceive the principle in that case which is at all in contrariety to or in disparagement of any principle that is insisted upon in the bill which is now before the Senate. Many arguments have been made about it; and no gentleman has ever as yet, here or elsewhere, undertaken to point out that there was any essential difference in the principle between the Gardiner case and this case, the only difference being that in the Gardiner case the money belonged to the United States by confession, and in this case it belongs to the United States by the decision of the Supreme Court; that is the only difference. The right of the United States to the money in the La Abra and Weil case is just as clear as it was in the Gardiner case, and fixed so absolutely by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Boynton vs. Blaine.

The Government of the United States in that case, represented by all its array of ability, by all of its authority, with all of the power that it possessed to gain the evidence in the time the case was being heard before the Commission (it was heard here in Washington), failed to discover the fraud that Gardiner had perpetrated. There was a search after that. That case was not loosely tried. The Government of the United States exerted itself to get a proper decree in the Gardiner case, surrounded with all of its powers. It failed to do it. The decree was given and the money was paid out, and then afterwards by an accident, just as it has been in this very case of La Abra and also in the case of Weil, the evidence came to light. Thereupon the Government of the United States, notwithstanding all the power it had possessed to have a fair trial, went to work and recovered the money back.

Now, contrast the situation of the Government of the United States in its dealings with the Gardiner case with the situation of Mexico under the circumstances which I have related to-day in its dealings with the La Abra case and the Weil case. Mr. President, out of the consideration of claims aggregating in their payment more than $500,000,000, in the torn and tattered condition of all Mexican authority in the State and in the courts, and also in consideration of our own disturbed condition, it is only a wonder that they got off as well as they did. It is only a wonder that the Mexican Government was entirely content to pay up the large awards that had been made against her in every case except those, and has paid the awards in these cases, only protesting that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to look into evidence which they subsequently discovered and to see whether that would not deprive the claimants of this fund of a right asserted by themselves, a right which is equitable if it is just and illegal if unjust, whether it was not the duty of the Government of the United States to look in and see whether they should pay this money to their citizens thus corruptly obtained. That is the simple case. That is the whole of it.

It has been stated by the Senator from Missouri [M. VEST] that the Government of Mexico is here making this demand. The Government of Mexico has never presented a petition to Congress or to any judicial tribunal in this country for the allowance to it of this claim or for the prevention of its being paid into the hands of the claimants. It has gone on and made its protest, as it had a perfect right to do, against the injustice of the Government of the United States paying money into the hands of men who had obtained a claim upon it through fraud and perjury. Common respect for the decencies of mankind all the way on this hemisphere from Patagonia to Greenland would justify a proceeding of that kind on the part of any government or any man whose property was being thus dealt with.

After Congress had acted upon this claim and had prescribed a method for its administration, to which I shall presently refer with a little more particularity, the Government of the United States, under the pressure of one influence and another—for it can be asserted with perfect security here that such a lobby never existed as existed in this case—the Government of the United States, under such pressure, went on and commenced paying out to these different claimants this fund as it was realized in the Treasury or in the hands of the Secretary of State. Protests were all the time being made. Congress was delaying about it, if not delinquent. Congress did not take the action upon it which the pressure of its own convictions as well as the opinion of mankind has forced upon it in later years.

The Government of Mexico came to Mr. Evarts, having employed Hon. Matt Carpenter to conduct the case. Mr. Carpenter looked through it, and under that provision of the Constitution which gives to a foreign government the right to sue in the courts of the United States, Mr. Carpenter advised that the claim could be maintained in the courts of equity of the Government. He made a brief of his authorities, which clearly showed that it could have been done. But Mr. Evarts, who is a wise, critical, sagacious, and patriotic statesman, and certainly one of the foremost men whom we have ever had in the State Department, concluded that there might be some implication of impeachment of the finality and force of the awards made if our local tribunals at the suit of the foreign government could be opened in the nature of a review to an investigation of facts upon which the award had proceeded.

Mr. Evarts was right about that. He took the ground in the very outset of this matter, where we have arrived to-day after trying various intermediate expedients—he took the ground that this award being final between the Governments, a proper respect for the sanctity of such awards and such conventions required that they should be final, as they were expressed to be in their terms as between the Governments. If citizens had against either Government claims of inattention or wrong the citizen could prefer it, as was done here in the case of the brig General Armstrong, where after years and years, almost three-quarters of a century, had expired, the Government of the United States voted about $80,000, or it may be $100,000, to the heirs at law of the owner of the brig General Armstrong, upon the ground that the Government of the United States, having cognizance of the claim of the captain of the brig against the Government of Portugal, and the whole subject of controversy between ourselves and Portugal in regard to other matters being referred to Louis Napoleon, as our Government had not taken the proper consideration of the case and had not referred it, consequently we became liable to that citizen for our inattention to his rights.

But with a view now of maintaining the absolute sanctity of these conventions, Mr. Evarts said to Mr. Carpenter and to the Mexican Government, "We can not permit you to bring suit in our courts in the name of the Mexican Government upon these claims, to set them aside or impeach them; Mexico is precluded; the convention has decided finally as to the award; Mexico has no longer any right that can be recognized in any way in the world except through the political department of this Government, and then it is to be recognized only as a question of morals and not as one of right on the part of Mexico; we can not permit you to bring this suit;" and so it was not tried.

Perhaps in the course of this argument I am trying to make I had better include a later event with that one for the purpose of showing in a consecutive way what has been done by Mexico and what has also been done by the United States to have this quarrel composed through existing judicial tribunals with the powers already conferred upon our judicial establishment and the respective complainants or claimants. While Mr. Bayard was Secretary of State it occurred to him that under the law organizing the Court of Claims, in a section which I shall read after a while, a provision was made that by the consent of the parties a controversy in which the United States was interested—not a case, but a controversy in which the United States was interested—might be referred for adjudication to the Court of Claims; and so he made this express overture to the claimants in the Weil case and in the La Abra case that they should consent to refer the controversy to the Court of Claims under an existing statute of the United States which provided that it could only be referred by the consent of both parties. Mr. Weil refused to accede to it. Here is the correspondence. A very elaborate brief is made out to show the reasons why they would not consent to that; and in the course of their brief they insisted that their controversy had become a case; that it was no longer a controversy; that the award settled the matter in their favor; that it was their property and their right; that they had the right and claimed it without respect to the justice of the demand at all; that the demand had grown into a judgment which was unimpeachable, and that they would not voluntarily consent to their case being heard before the Court of Claims.

That exhausted, you see, two of the supposed remedies, one in favor of Mexico that Mr. Matt Carpenter in his brief, and a very elegant and elaborate one it is, fully sustained upon authority; the other one presented by Mr. Bayard, in his letters which are here, showing that these parties would not consent to take this controversy before the Court of Claims and there have it adjudicated. That excluded as a matter of course both these tribunals, the equity courts of the United States as they at present exist, and the Court of Claims under the jurisdiction given to it by an act of Congress, in respect of which I will remark also that an appeal lies to the Supreme Court from the judgment, settling the controversy.

Then there was left to the Congress of the United States, and to the President, to these four Presidents all of whom concurred in saying that the honor of the Government of the United States required that these claims should be reheard—there was left to these agencies of the Government the alternative of trying to arrange this by a treaty with Mexico, or to arrange it by making a provision of law by which our domestic tribunals should, without the consent of the claimants, bring them within the reach of the power of justice and have this matter decided.

Now, you have got the case. We failed upon the treaty because we could not get a two-thirds majority. I have always doubted it. I have always been disposed to agree with Mr. Evarts as the Senate did agree with him on that occasion. The treaty-making power was not the proper power to pledge the United States to the return of this money, but it ought to be a governmental act, spread over all the powers of government of a legislative character, and not one confined merely to the treaty-making authority, which is special to the Senate and to the President.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator from Alabama what was the necessity for us to make the contract, which is a treaty with Mexico, in order to enable us to redress a wrong which had been committed in Mexico?

Mr. MORGAN. That question brings back to my mind the same debate we had in the Senate over the treaty, where some of the ablest lawyers of this body maintained in a way that I think was almost unanswerable the very question the Senator from Mississippi has put now. What was the necessity or where was the power to make a new contract, to revive one that we had made heretofore with the Government of Mexico? The Senate answered that by failing to give a majority of two-thirds in favor of that treaty, and in doing so the Senate was perfectly conscious that its action on that occasion was a mere disavowal of the remedy that was sought through treaty, and not by any means an affirmation of the sincerity of these claims or of the honesty and integrity of the evidence upon which they were based when they were brought before the Commission. That is the situation as to the Senate.

Now, then, we have the case here of an effort on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I trust the Senate will approve it—to provide a domestic remedy which shall operate against the consent of the claimants, which shall not be dependent in any respect upon their assent to our legislation, but which shall be in the nature of the exercise on our part of our sovereignty, which stands for the protection of justice and equity and right. It is proposed that we shall enact a remedy here by which we shall confer upon one of our local jurisdictions the right to hear and determine what? Not the merits of the original claim so as to render a decree between the Government of the United States and the claimants upon the whole merits of the original claim, but to determine that specific point which the Government can not ignore and which always must be heard—so says the Supreme Court—when a convention is had, whether the honor of the Government of the United States requires that this award should be withheld because of the fact that the award itself was obtained by the claimants on account of fraud, perjury, or other false practices.

Here stands the award; the evidence between the United States and Mexico of an indebtedness paid. The money stands there now to represent the rights of whoever may be concerned. Then neither the La Abra Company nor Weil nor his representatives having a legal right to it, and the claim having been based upon certain rights which were supposed to exist in their behalf and certain wrongs which were supposed to have been done to them, it creates on the part of the United States Government a duty of an equitable recognition so far as the claim is just.

Then the question arises will the Government of the United States sustain this claim of equitable recognition on the part of these claimants against this fund when it is shown by the evidence brought before this committee, and will be shown before this court if this evidence is sustained there to its satisfaction, that the claims were founded in falsehood; that they were obtained and supported by perjury, and since that time they have been upheld even before the Senate in a way and by means that show the Government of the United States ought to spurn them and not to tolerate them in any sense.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Alabama is on a committee for another purpose, and it is somewhat important that he attend to the duties of that committee at this time. I therefore suggest, if it will not be any inconvenience to the Senator to stop in his argument at this point——

Mr. MORGAN. No; I should like to stop. I am not quite so well as I should like to be in order to discuss this matter.

Mr. FRYE. Then I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 27, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for immediate consideration, the bill the title of which has just been read. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the bill to be read, and will then ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I rose to what I think is a question of privilege, but will wait.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to relieve the University of the State of Missouri, at Columbia, Mo., from all money responsibility for so much of the ordnance and ordnance stores issued to said university, under its bond, dated April 7, 1886, as was destroyed by fire on January 9, 1892.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LANE obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

SUBTREASURIES.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4773) to establish a system of subtreasuries, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN R. F. TATNALL.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1487) to remove the political disabilities of John R. F. Tatnall.

Be it enacted, etc., That the political disabilities of John R. F. Tatnall, late an officer of marines in the Marine Corps of the United States Navy, arising under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to state that this proposition or request is accompanied by a petition from the person who desires the political disabilities removed.

The SPEAKER. Subject to objection, this will be considered to be the second reading of the bill, and the question will be on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL INCORPORATION LAW, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back favorably the bill which I send to the desk, being a bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding, after the words "or for the purpose of insuring title to real estate," the words "or for the purpose of carrying on fire insurance;" so as to read:

"That the five hundred and fifty-third section of the Revised Statues of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding, after the words "life insurance," the words "or for the purpose of insuring titles to real estate or for the purpose of carrying on fire insurance."

SEC. 2. That section 2 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding, after the words "or for the purpose of insuring title to real estate," the words "or for the purpose of carrying on fire insurance;" so as to read:

"SEC. 3. That any company heretofore formed, agreeably to the aforesaid section of the said Revised Statutes, for the purpose of insuring titles to real estate or for the purpose of carrying on fire insurance may become perpetual on filing in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia a certificate to that effect, in like manner as is provided by law for the filing of the original certificate of incorporation."

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to say but a word in explanation of the necessity for the early passage of this bill. Under the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia certain insurance companies were duly organized, but that general law provides no means by which they may continue their existence after a period of twenty years. The purpose of this bill is to permit those companies, upon filing proper certificates with the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, to continue in existence. That is its only object. The term of one of these corporations will expire on the 23d of next month; therefore it is important that the bill should be passed at an early day.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, does this bill come as a report from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will say to the gentleman that the bill is reported unanimously.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN R. F. TATNALL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call attention to an informality which occurred in the consideration of the bill passed this morning for the relief of John R. F. Tatnall. When the bill was before the House the Chair failed to notice that it was one which required a two-thirds vote; but it was in fact passed by a two-thirds vote, and the Chair brings the matter to the attention of the House now simply to say that he will have the Journal state that the bill was passed by such a vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory;"

A bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

It also announced that the Senate had passed

A bill (S. 1045) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Leadville, in the State of Colorado; in which concurrence was requested.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

By unanimous consent, bills of the following titles were severally introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred as below:

CHARGE OF DESERTION.

By Mr. HOAR: A bill (H. R. 4774) to amend section 3 of the act of August 14, 1888, entitled "An act to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy or Marine Corps from the charge of desertion"—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REFUND OF DUTIES ON WRECKAGE.

By Mr. HOAR: A bill (H. R. 4775) to refund certain duties on wreckage collected at San Francisco—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

THE CONTROVERSY WITH CHILE.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to inform the House whether any answer has been received, either from our minister to Chile, Patrick Egan, esq., or from the Government of Chile, to the dispatch sent by the Government of the United States to the Republic of Chile on January 21, and if so, from whom such answer was received and at what time; and that he will communicate to the House all the correspondence between the Government of the United States, its minister to Chile, and the Chilean Government, not communicated to Congress with the message heretofore sent in.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I was out when the Clerk began reading the resolution, and I ask that it be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HITT and Mr. BLOUNT addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] yield?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I desire to reserve the floor, but I am willing to yield if the gentleman desires to make a remark.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HITT. I thought the gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HITT. And I will yield to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois knows very well that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] who has introduced the resolution is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, is this matter before the House now for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed of any rule which prevents it from being so.

Mr. REED. I simply ask for information whether it is before the House for discussion.

The SPEAKER. There may have been some rule adopted by the House in the absence of the Chair which would affect the question. If not, the Chair knows no reason why the discussion of the resolution is not now in order.

Mr. REED. Do not the rules for reference cover it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Kentucky will indulge me a moment——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Certainly. What time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not a matter of time. I have just come into the Hall, and I would like to hear the resolution read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know whether it is in order at this time to move the reference of that resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I make that motion, and upon that I ask for the previous question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman can not take me off the floor for the purpose of making that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated three times that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] was entitled to the floor, but the gentleman did not proceed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I yielded for the gentleman from Georgia to make a remark.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Kentucky proceeds, I understand——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I wish it understood, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman is proceeding in my time. I have not yielded the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Kentucky is well able to take care of himself. I simply want to get at the parliamentary status.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if, when the resolution was first submitted, a motion had been made to refer it to a committee, that motion would have been in order, but no such motion was made, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. The Chair therefore holds that the gentleman from Kentucky has the floor and has a right to debate his resolution, and that a motion can only come when some one gets the floor to make it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to make any remarks upon the resolution?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a few words, and then, if the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs thinks this is a resolution that ought to go to that committee instead of being adopted at once and will make that motion upon his responsibility as chairman of the committee, I shall not object. We have received a message from the President of the United States concerning the question of peace or war with an American Republic under circumstances that must, in the nature of the case, be critical, otherwise the President would not have sent in the message. It may be possible that some officer of that Republic did send some response to the dispatch repeated in the message which the President has sent to us, or an intimation as to why delay was necessary or further time required. We know the fact to be that on January 21 a dispatch was sent by our Government to the Republic of Chile. I do not now criticise the President for not waiting until a final answer had been received, or until time for such an answer had elapsed, before sending that message to Congress. I do not now criticise either the haste with which the message followed the dispatch, or the language of the message, pending the consideration by that Republic of its action under the dispatch of January 21. It must be, however, remembered that the language of the message to the Congress of the United States could be communicated on the telegraph wire to the authorities of Chile, and might, if no answer had already been made to the dispatch of January 21, affect the nature of the answer that that Government would feel called upon to make

Is it too great a presumption to indulge in that the President of a great and free people, dealing with a free but feeble people, would not have used such language pending the consideration by it of its answer to that dispatch of his? It is not too great a presumption to indulge that a great emergency like that would have demanded from that President due consideration and ample time if he had not had some intimation of what the answer would be. It is scarcely credible that the language—I will not say so insulting, but so severe—used by him would have been used if he had believed it possible that a friendly and sufficient response would be made to his dispatch of January 21. It is therefore not impossible that he may have had some intimation of what the answer would be, and yet that it was in such unofficial, or informal, or secret manner received as to justify him in not putting it into his message. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This matter is now in the hands of Congress. Under the Constitution the power is granted to Congress alone to declare war. The President has put upon us the duty of determining that question. We must face it, and so decide it that the honor and the dignity of the American people shall be upheld. No man in this House, no matter what his party connections, no matter from what section of the country he may come, but will at all hazards protect the humblest seaman that wears the American uniform or guard at whatever expense the honor and the glory of the American people. [Applause.] This will be accepted without the saying as true by every honorable man in all the country. The honor, the glory, the dignity of the Republic, the safety, the security of its seamen, are safe in the hands of this Congress.

But war is the ultimate resort. It is only the last resort, especially so when the war must be with a republic like our own, anxious for liberty, desiring to maintain constitutional freedom, seeking progress by means of that freedom; and this consideration is greatly strengthened by the fact that that Republic is in the midst of great internal trouble (having just overthrown a dictator), seeking congressional liberty under constitutional guaranties. All brave men, all generous men, all who love liberty will desire to bear and forbear with such a people passing through such a strait in the midst of such desperate conditions, as long as our honor will allow us to bear and forbear with her. [Applause.]

Therefore it is our duty to know all the facts. Every fact that can bear any relation to this matter is part of our necessary information in arriving at the conclusion which we must reach upon a matter so important as this. And I confess it did not occur to me that my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BLOUNT], or any member of the House would hesitate one moment to submit this request to the President of the United States. Whether by reference, by postponement, or by delay of any other sort we weaken the attitude that we ought to bear to this question. It seems to me we should promptly say to the President: "At once give us all the information you have; immediately send to us all that has been communicated to you. Before our opinions crystallize into convictions, before we become biased by the reading of this correspondence in which are unkind and bitter things, before our tempers are aroused by the offensive expressions which in moments of heat, amid great troubles, have been uttered, before any conclusion has been reached, give us all the facts, so that we may keep our minds unbiased until we have all that is possible of truth and light to base our conclusions upon."

Mr. Speaker, I have omitted from the resolution the ordinary words, "If not incompatible with the interests of the public service," because that language does not apply to this case. When the House asks from the President information about matters on which he has not communicated, then it is but courteous to let him decide whether the information of which he is the custodian can be safely communicated to the public. But when he has taken the initiative; when he has sent correspondence on the subject to Congress; when he has felt that the question has passed beyond the reach of executive action and must now be decided by Congressional determination, then we are entitled to all the correspondence, to all the information. There is then no reserve that can properly be couched in the technical and formal language, "If not incompatible with the interests of the public service."

Mr. Speaker, this is a more important question than any other that will probably come before Congress during this session. We are now engaged, and have been for years, in seeing whether we can tie the nations of the American hemisphere closer together. The old desire of Bolivar, that in some way or other—by some sort of international agreement, some form of pact or contract—there could be a union of the American peoples so as to preserve this hemisphere from European interference, is now being attempted to be made practical by the statesmen of the present generation. Republican or Democrat, each is looking, by reciprocity or other agreement, by Pan-American congresses, by other associated meetings of representatives, to bring these countries closer together. Surely at the beginning of this adverse action communicated to Congress in this message of the President—action looking not to peace, but to war; looking not to communion, but to bloodshed—it seemed to me the House would not hesitate to take whatever steps might be offered to it to obtain the necessary light, or if it be not necessary, the additional light, if there be any, that may be cast over the pathway which it has to tread.

That was all that was in my view in submitting the resolution. In that sense I have uttered what I have said, and if the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, does not think that it ought to come to immediate consideration, and will make a motion to refer it to the committee, I will not make any opposition to it, although I think seriously that he has made a mistake. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I reserve the remainder of my time, if I have any left.

Mr. BOATNER. Before the gentleman from Kentucky takes his seat will he permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. I wish to ask if the gentleman has any information that the Chilean Government has replied to the ultimatum of this Government?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I have no information except that which has come to every member of this House. I have only such information as we see in the public prints, the various public prints that we are in the habit of reading, and I do not know whether the statement there appearing is accurate or not. I have only this information, that on the 21st day of January a dispatch was submitted by the Government of the United States, through the American minister at Chile, to the Republic of Chile; that on the 25th of January the President of the United States communicated a message to this House, and that it is not unfair to presume he had either received an intimation of what the answer would be of the Government of Chile or of the cause of the failure to answer, and that if he has had that information, we ought to know what it is. If he had despaired of it, and no answer has come since, we ought to know that. If anything has come we ought to know what it is. That is my frank answer to the gentleman from Louisiana, and I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the time and attention of the House but for a very brief space. Whether this House hereafter in its wisdom, and in view of the gravity of the situation in the matter of our relations with Chile, shall see fit to consider these matters in secret session or not, at least it seems to me that at this time, and before any course shall have been determined upon, there ought not to be thrust upon this House and the country by any mode of procedure a discussion of that situation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I remember—and the history is familiar to you all—the course pursued by Congress in the war of 1812. A message was sent to the Congress of the United States, the Senate and House, and both bodies went immediately into executive session. The Committees on Foreign Affairs of both bodies resolved upon secrecy of procedure, and the report of the Committees on Foreign Affairs was made in the House, accompanied by a declaration of war, and other measures subsequently taken in relation to the regulation of privateering. Not one thing was given to the public. The injunction of secrecy was never removed until the signing of the bill declaring war by the President of the United States.

Is there anything in that procedure, directed by the eminent men of those times, to admonish us that neither by indirection nor by direction should we deviate from that deliberate, calm course in which the safety of the country rests?

Sir, there is a great responsibility upon this House at this time. I trust that this resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that every matter touching this question will be so referred; because we have an illustration at this very instant how unexpectedly to everybody the situation has been brought to the consideration of the House and the country. I presume and trust that no gentleman on the floor of the House will undertake to discuss the matter pro or con. So far as any information is concerned in relation to dispatches received to-day or yesterday or to-morrow, for one, and speaking for the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I assure the gentleman from Kentucky and this House that that committee will not be willing to make any report to this body without exhausting all the information to be had from the correspondence. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I beg this House to remember that the line of safety is the line of deliberation. You can trust yourselves as well to-morrow or next week, after deliberation, as you can in the confusion provoked by instantaneous discussion. I only ask that we proceed seriously, earnestly, calmly, and manfully in all this matter. [Applause.]

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, we are in the midst of a very grave crisis. No one can say with absolute certainty that the situation is less grave to-day than it was on yesterday. No one can say with absolute certainty that the news which appears this morning as an Associated Press dispatch from Santiago is true. There are features on the face of that telegram which, in my opinion, render it very doubtful whether the dispatch states the truth. Suppose the good news that an amicable settlement is at hand be untrue. Suppose while the grave questions between Chile and our country are still unsettled we pass now a resolution of the kind introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky. What will be its meaning? I do not say that the gentleman himself intends to cast any such imputation, but in my opinion the country will look at a resolution like that, passed now, as imputing to the Chief Executive in a matter of such grave concern as his message of yesterday bad faith to the country and bad faith to this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Shall we turn away from the grave questions at issue between us and Chille to enter into a wrangle with our President on an unsupported charge like that contained in this resolution? An attempt to press it to an immediate consideration carries with it also, Mr. Speaker, some sort of imputation upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which this whole matter has been properly referred. Is not that committee competent to consider this whole question? It did not need the assurance of the distinguished chairman of that committee [Mr. BLOUNT] to convince this House that every means of information would be exhausted by that committee before it should make its report. I think we can trust that committee, and I think that if there be anything whatever in it the resolution will keep for a few days. In a matter as grave and important as this, at a time when the issues of peace or war are trembling in the balance, let us be deliberate; let us not now engage in a discussion such as that which such a resolution as this would provoke, a discussion in which the President might be attacked by some and defended by others, when all of us ought to bend our attention to Chile and the Chilean question.

Has the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] or anybody else any evidence on which to base this resolution; and what reason has he to give why, if a discussion of this kind shall be proper at any time, it ought to be precipitated now? I trust that the House will not do it, but that we will let the whole matter go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That resolution, according to the rules of the House, must be reported within fifteen days, adversely or otherwise. Why not let it go to the committee?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, this House is confronted now with grave and important questions. These questions were of sufficient importance for the President of the United States to send to this House on yesterday a message, accompanied with documents and diplomatic correspondence. This morning the Committee on Foreign Affairs had a meeting. Therefore I have a right to assume that all proper dispatch has been made. I respect my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], who has offered this resolution; but I see no reason now for unreasonable haste in the consideration of a question so important as this.

If this resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I have reason to believe that it will receive immediate and prompt consideration. We in this House have not, in the last few weeks, been acting upon what we have seen in the newspapers; but we have waited until the Chief Executive sent to this House a statement of the situation in Chile, accompanied by the correspondence. Is there any reason now why this House should, in great haste, when there is a Committee on Foreign Affairs, appointed to look into these matters, undertake to take charge of this matter, and call for the additional correspondence without referring the resolution to a committee? If there is other correspondence, it will come in due time, and it seems to me, sir, that the situation demands that gravity, that coolness, that deliberation, that care which will show that we are not acting as partisans, but as patriots. [Applause.] I agree, Mr. Speaker, with my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that this resolution should be referred to that committee. An early report will be made. No one can be injured by reasonable delay. The country will not suffer and no member of this House will lose any of his rights by a reasonable delay, in order that the proper committee of this House may consider this grave question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield one minute to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, it has been the usage of this House, through different Administrations, in confiding questions that concern our relations with other countries to a Committee on Foreign Affairs, in which every shade of opinion in the House is represented, to have that committee, which has always been substantially nonpartisan and truly patriotic, as I have observed it since I was a member of this House, in such relations with the Executive that if information of the kind desired by the gentleman from Kentucky in his resolution was to be obtained at all, it was accessible to your committee without resolutions. That committee represents the sentiment, the opinions, and the wishes of this House, and you can trust it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ask the previous question on the motion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Before the gentleman does that, for I suppose that is not debatable——

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would like to have five minutes of my own time, and then I will yield to the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I prefer to insist upon the motion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I will state to the gentleman that if he cuts me off I shall make the fight against his motion, but if he allows me five minutes now I shall keep my word, and if he then makes the motion I shall not object to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, what I want to say is in a pleasant way. I have been criticised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], and by my classmate, colleague, and friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY]; and I confess I am greatly surprised that a resolution, which is simply one of inquiry [cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side], that does not touch the merits of any question except to ask information, should have been received as this has been by those gentlemen.

I confess that it never occurred to me—and the Speaker will probably recollect that when he arose to put the question originally I asked no time for debate—that any one would object to a resolution simply asking for information—one that does not touch the merits of any controversy between Chile and the United States of America; one that does not criticise anybody, executive officer or our minister there, or anyone connected with this transaction, but simply asks for light.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. Have you the slightest question in your own mind but that when the President receives an answer to the dispatch of the 21st he will communicate it instantly to this House? Have you any question about it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I am not in the confidence of the present President of the United States [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], and if I were to answer the gentleman's question it might be in frankness that I might feel that it was my duty to say certain things about certain parts of his message that I do not consider proper to say now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why not speak frankly, if you speak at all? [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURROWS. But does my friend wish to intimate that the President of the United States, when he receives an answer to the dispatch of the 21st instant, will withhold it from the House?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think that if the President of the United States receives this resolution of the House he will not decline to give any information he has. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURROWS. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And that was precisely the object of it, Mr. Speaker. I admit, with the gentlemen who have spoken, a sense of the gravity of the crisis before us, and it is because I have feared that war might be forced upon us when it was not necessary for the honor of the American Republic that I have felt the gravity of the situation that probably other gentlemen did not feel. I only desire to add that when the time comes I hope that I may prove myself a patriot, even if a partisan—and I am a partisan. I believe what I believe so intensely that I never have any doubt as to what side I am on, or as to the difference between myself and gentlemen on the other side; and because I am a partisan, I am a patriot. It is the depth of the conviction of my belief as to party principles that makes me desire that those principles shall be crystallized into policy and into statute.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman who has been so long and distinguished a leader of his party in this House, and the other two gentlemen who are distinguished Democrats, and who are on that committee, desire to take this simple resolution of inquiry and discuss it with the gravity that becomes the deliberations of a great committee upon a matter of information, whether we shall have this information or not, I shall not object to the reference. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will pardon me for just a moment. Perhaps I could have no better answer to the gentleman from Kentucky than to say there is illustrated in this very scene how, by his simple, harmless resolution, the discussion of this whole situation shall be precipitated upon this House. There is no way for this House to guard itself, except by reference of every question to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I trust that they will keep within its control the power, always, as to how the subject shall be taken up and considered. The power lies in this body, not with the President of the United States, but in the Congress of the United States, to declare whether it will or will not make war. The Executive of the United States can not compel this body to do anything but what they deliberately will to do; and therefore I trust that we shall proceed with deliberation and with courage from the beginning to the end of this matter.

I now move the previous question on the motion to refer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Georgia moves the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Rules, I desire to call up for consideration the report submitted from that committee on Thursday last. As the House knows, these proposed rules have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I can not hear a word that the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The Sergeant-at-Arms will please aid the Speaker in obtaining order on the floor. Members who feel that they must converse will please retire to the cloakroom, as public business can not be transacted in such disorder.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The rules proposed, Mr. Speaker, have been published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I presume gentlemen have read them, and therefore it will not be necessary, at least at this stage of our proceedings, to have them read formally at the Clerk's desk. I desire to take the sense of the House as to the best method by which we shall proceed—that is, whether we shall go along without any limitation as to the time for general debate for the present, or whether we shall endeavor to agree as to the time at which general debate shall close. I assume that later on it will be necessary that rules be read by paragraphs, in order that separate votes may be taken upon the amendments that may be offered to those paragraphs. I desire to ascertain what the sense of the House is as to general debate, whether it shall go on for the present without any limit, or that we shall agree upon some time at which general debate shall be closed; and I should be very glad to have some suggestions from my colleague on the committee [Mr. REED] and other gentlemen who may desire to speak on that proposition.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I understand that a number of gentlemen on this side desire to address the House in general debate upon the question of the rules. How long a time they will require it is a little difficult for me to say now; but I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] that the general debate be allowed to go on a reasonable time, and then, perhaps, some arrangement can be made. I am not particular, however, about that suggestion being followed. Whatever reasonable proposition he makes will be likely to be acceded to upon this side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that unless some agreement is made as to the general debate, any gentlemen getting the floor can offer an amendment at any time. There is nothing in general parliamentary law, or even in the rules of the House, that would prevent that. Therefore, if it is desired that there shall be a period during which the question shall be open to general debate without the privilege of offering amendments, that must be arranged by agreement. Subsequently there might be a time when the rules should be read by the Clerk and considered by paragraphs for amendment, under the five-minute rule, or such other rule as the House might agree upon.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I suggest, then, Mr. Speaker, that general debate be allowed to go on during this day, and that after to-day we take up the report of the Committee on Rules by paragraphs and vote separately on the amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. No amendments to be offered during the general debate?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No amendments to be offered during the general debate; but I suggest that gentlemen desiring to offer amendments shall have them printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendments to be considered only when we come to discuss the matter under the five-minute rule?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, there has been some confusion in this part of the Hall, and I desire to ascertain whether I understand my colleague's proposition clearly. I understand it to be that this day shall be devoted to general debate, and that thereafter the report of the Committee on Rules shall be taken up and considered by paragraphs, and that the paragraphs shall then be subject to amendment as read.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That was my proposition; and that the consideration of the report after the general debate be under the five-minute rule. I suggested also that all proposed amendments might be published in the RECORD, so that the House might be better advised of their purport; but I do not insist upon that.

Mr. BURROWS. You would not preclude the offering of amendments that had not been so printed?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] asks unanimous consent that the remainder of this day be devoted to general debate on the report of the Committee on Rules without the right of amendment; that on to-morrow the rules be taken up for consideration by paragraphs under what is known in debate as the five-minute rule; that the rules be then read by paragraphs; that as each paragraph is read it shall be open to amendment, and that, thus proceeding, we go through the report. The Chair desires to state also, in that connection, that it is desired that there shall be considered as pending the substitute offered by the minority, being, as the Chair understands, the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. REED. With a single amendment.

The SPEAKER. With a single amendment. The pendency of that substitute in no wise interfering, of course, with the right to amend the original. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]?

Mr. REED. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that perhaps a better way would be to allow three hours for general debate on either side, and then to begin the arrangement suggested by him.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will agree to that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine to explain his proposition. Some of us have offered amendments to the report of the Committee on Rules. Now, under the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Maine, would we have a part of the time? And, if so, on what side?

Mr. REED. If the occasion was of sufficient seriousness we would be very glad to welcome the gentleman from Kentucky to our side, and anybody else that was willing to come. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCREARY. The gentleman from Maine misunderstands me. I have offered an amendment to the report of the Committee on Rules, and I hope that gentlemen on that side [the Republican side] will appreciate that amendment sufficiently to vote for it, because it is a good amendment. But what I desired to ascertain was how the time was to be divided. Did the gentleman from Maine mean three hours for his party and three hours for the other side?

Mr. REED. That is what I meant.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would like to make a similar suggestion, Mr. Speaker. This matter of the rules is not a two-sided question. It is rather a polygon or an octagon——

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in suggesting three hours I had in mind only the number of Republicans who desired to address the House upon this question, and if it be desired that more time shall be given to those upon the other side of the House who are not in favor of the rules as reported, I shall not object to any reasonable arrangement of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that as the House is not crowded with business——

Mr. REED. Perhaps a better way of phrasing it would be to say that the House is not crowded with a disposition to act upon business. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Possibly that would be better; but in fact the House has not been crowded with business, because the committees have not yet reported much business.

Mr. WATSON. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to consider a request coming from those who favor the amendment (really in the nature of a substitute for the report of the Committee on Rules) offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. OTIS]. I refer to the proposed substitute for Rule X. We ask that the gentleman from Mississippi modify his proposition so as to allow us a distinctive distribution or allotment of time—half an hour or an hour—whatever he thinks is fair, or whatever the House may think is fair—to discuss that proposition. There are some eight or ten of us who favor that——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that all amendments can be discussed under the five-minute rule. That is the object of the five-minute rule.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I suggest that there is really no political division on the question of the rules as a whole. As to the great body of the rules there is no special disagreement on either side. The rules of the Fiftieth Congress and the rules of the Fifty-first Congress are, as to four-fifths if not nine-tenths of the matter embraced in them, precisely the same. The differences, while very radical, are comparatively few. Now the Committee on Rules have presented their report in the form of amendments to the rules of the Fiftieth Congress. The proposed rules which they submit are the rules of the Fiftieth Congress, with comparatively few amendments. As to those amendments there is no doubt division on both sides of the Chamber. Therefore it would not represent the proper condition or situation of the House with reference to this proposed code if we should have the time divided politically. Gentlemen on the Republican side probably agree with four-fifths of the matter embraced in this proposed code. They probably agree with the principal of the proposed amendments.

Mr. WATSON. I understood that I occupied the floor.

The SPEAKER. This discussion is all proceeding by unanimous consent. The Chair is indulging members to see whether an agreement can be reached. If any gentleman makes the point, this discussion must all stop. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I trust that we may be able to come to some agreement. Anything in the world that suits the House will suit me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] that on this question, as on other questions, there are two sides. The question is not how many different sentiments there may be in the House on general politics. On one side of the question the opinion is in favor of the rules of the Fiftieth Congress substantially; on the other it is in favor of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress substantially. I have no idea that the gentleman from Georgia or his friends will have any difficulty whatever in getting whatever recognition they may desire if the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine as to general debate for six hours be agreed to. Under that agreement I think we shall be able to accommodate all gentlemen who desire to speak on the subject. And wherein there may be any failure of any gentleman to be heard in the general debate, that debate will be supplemented by the discussion under the five-minute rule; so that I think no gentleman will have reason to complain of not obtaining a fair hearing.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] can not have read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas, if he thinks it falls under the classification which he has made as to either proposed body of rules.

The proposition of the gentleman from Kansas is a departure from the rules of either the Fiftieth or the Fifty-first Congress. He proposes a different and distinct parliamentary principle in the organization of the House. Now, we do not claim that this proposition will be seriously considered by either of the two sides of the House represented by the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Maine, but it is seriously considered by us; and standing here a minority of eight or nine men, with equal rights to be heard on this floor, we do claim the right to express our opinions to the country and to have our reasons for this proposition go on the record.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] that in the remarks I just made I forgot for the moment the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas. I suppose my colleague on the Committee on Rules [Mr. CATCHINGS] would not object to allowing a proper time for the advocacy of that proposition.

Mr. WATSON. Give us an hour.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think it would be very proper to allow one hour in advocacy of the substitute of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WATSON. That would be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized, and the Chair hopes the regular order will proceed.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Mississippi on this point. I suggest that we may possibly reach an agreement on this matter by first determining how much time shall be devoted to the general debate, and then proceeding, according to the rule of proportion, to divide the time among the political parties according to their relative strength in the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Before proceeding with my remarks I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I desire to know whether I am entitled now to one hour by virtue of the fact that I have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is.

Mr. REED. Does the Chair decide that the gentleman from Misssissippi is limited to one hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asked the Chair whether he was entitled to an hour. The Chair answered that he was. The Chair would be inclined to think, in the absence of any rules, that the one-hour rule—the general parliamentary law—would be applied to such proceedings as these.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that we can come to an agreement now, and I will renew the suggestion that we limit the time to six hours, three hours to be given to the Republican side and three to our side, out of which we will give to the third party one hour of time.

Mr. LANHAM. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he so modify his request as to make the general debate seven hours, three to each side and one to the third party.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Very well, I will agree to that suggestion, and I ask consent of the House now that the general debate be limited to seven hours, three hours of which shall be used, if desired, by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, meaning the Republican side, three hours on this side of the Chamber, and one hour to gentlemen who compose the third party, and that at the expiration of the seven hours of general debate the rules be taken up under the five-minute rule for debate and amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The rules to be taken up and read seriatim?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir; and each paragraph subject to amendment as reached and not after it is passed.

Mr. REED. And with the understanding that the amendment is pending to substitute the rules of the Fifty-first Congress with one amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi as stated.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire very briefly, while I now have the floor, to call the attention of the House to the amendments which have been proposed by the Committee on Rules to the rules which prevailed in the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. Before the gentleman proceeds, I am requested by gentlemen around me to inquire whether or not the amendments which have been published in the RECORD will be considered as pending amendments to be voted upon?

The SPEAKER. The understanding was that no such amendments were to be considered as pending; nor is there any amendment pending except the substitute for the report of the committee presented by the minority.

Mr. ENLOE. I suppose it will be in order to offer them under the five-minute rule, and have a vote upon them in that way?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, when the paragraphs to which they apply are reached.

Mr. CUMMINGS. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me I withdraw the objection I made to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will ask if there be further objection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the agreement seven hours will now be devoted to general debate on the rules. The Chair would ask before proceeding whether it be the desire of the House that the time shall be controlled by some gentleman representing the majority and the minority, or whether that shall be left to the Chair?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] control the time on this side and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] on the other, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], representing the third party, the hour allotted to them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the rules proposed by the committee are in the main those which prevailed in the Fiftieth Congress, there being not more than three or four amendments to that code suggested. I shall allude very briefly to those amendments, and then yield the floor to some gentleman who desires to be heard in the general discussion.

The first amendment, I will say to gentlemen, is borrowed from the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, and was designed to put an end to disputes which constantly grew up between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Military Affairs as to which had jurisdiction over coast defenses. The words "and coast defenses" were added to section 3 of Rule XI, in defining the powers of the Committee on Appropriations in the Fifty-first Congress, for the purpose of making it clear and distinct that the Committee on Appropriations should have jurisdiction alone over that subject. We have incorporated these words in Rule XI as reported, the intention being that the Committee on Military Affairs should not have jurisdiction over that subject.

The next amendment, sir, is also in Rule XI. But first among the committees which are given leave to report at any time we include the Committee on Rules. We then provide as follows:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

The effect of that amendment, if it shall be adopted, will be to place the reports from the Committee on Rules in the same category with motions to suspend the rules; and we have also provided that—pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion to adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the vote is taken on suspension.

That rule has prevailed, so far as I can ascertain, always in Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Under the proposed amendment, is it within the power of the Speaker to determine that any motion, after the question has once been taken on adjournment, is a dilatory motion?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. How is it to be determined?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will answer that proposition in this way: Every motion which postpones, even for a moment, the consideration of a question, is classed in parliamentary law as a dilatory motion. It is a dilatory motion, not because the person making it may desire to postpone the consideration of the pending question, but because it necessarily has that effect.

A motion to adjourn is a dilatory motion, whether the person making that motion makes it for the purpose of postponing consideration, in the way of obstruction of pending business, or not. That rule simply declares that all these motions which are understood in parliamentary law to be dilatory motions shall not be in order after one motion to adjourn had been made and acted upon.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then, if I understand the gentleman, the object of that amendment is to give to the Committee on Rules absolute control of the House. Is that it?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, Mr. Speaker, my friend puts it a little too strongly. I was about to explain what the object of the rule is, and perhaps the gentleman will be satisfied when I have finished my explanation. It certainly was not the intention to give the Committee on Rules absolute control of the business of this House; but the true object of that rule was to lodge somewhere the power which would enable this House, when a majority desired seriously to have a vote upon important business, to have that vote. I have believed, as many gentlemen on this side have believed, always, that the House should at all times have power at some time, in some way, to come to a vote upon a proposition. It is not expected, however, that this power will be exercised daily, or weekly, or perhaps monthly, because the very fact that the power is lodged somewhere which will enable the House to come to a vote will have the effect of preventing filibustering, unless it is in accordance with the wish of members of the House in the majority that there shall be filibustering.

I mean by that that oftentimes it is more convenient and more desirable to the House that a measure shall be filibustered to death than that a formal proposition shall come in by which the House will be compelled to vote it down; so that I assume that the occasions will not be frequent when it will be necessary for the Committee on Rules to exercise this power if the House shall adopt this amendment.

It is understood by all gentlemen who are familiar with the practices of past Congresses that as the business of the House progresses, and as there becomes a great rush for consideration of this measure and that, the Committee on Rules have undertaken heretofore generally, it is true, by unanimous consent, to set apart certain days for the consideration of certain measures, making what we speak of as special orders.

Now, we assume that if this amendment shall be adopted the Committee on Rules will go on, as Committees on Rules of previous Congresses have gone on, and in perhaps ninety-nine cases out of one hundred will content themselves with fixing a day for the consideration of a bill, leaving the House to dispose of the measures, when they come up, in its own way. But in the case of an important measure, which it was quite evident that the great bulk of this House desires to have a vote upon—I am not speaking now of partisan majorities, because fortunately partisanship manifests itself but in rare instances—I say that there are measures which gentlemen upon both sides of this House would be glad to have a vote upon, measures which ought to be passed, but which, under the old rules, were at the mercy of gentlemen who might choose to filibuster and prevent any consideration at all. I think nobody will deny that in a case of that sort the House will have the power to come to a vote. And in a case of that sort I have no question, if this amendment should be adopted and it should be manifestly the desire of this House, without reference to partisanship, that the House should have the right to vote upon the pending proposition, that the Committee on Rules would provide means under this power given them by which the House should have that vote. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I have made myself plain to my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. What I desire to know is, if this amendment should be adopted, does it not put it within the power of the Committee on Rules to absolutely control the House and regulate what legislation shall be had and what shall not be had?

Mr. CATCHINGS. It does not, Mr. Speaker. Ordinarily this House goes on and disposes of business which comes up in its own way.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But suppose some legislation should be before the House that did not meet with the approval of the Committee on Rules. If this amendment is adopted does it not put it within the power of that committee to bring immediately before the House some measure that does meet with the approval of that committee, and thus displace the obnoxious proposed legislation?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, not at all, Mr. Speaker, because when the Committee on Rules makes a report the House must adopt that report; and if the House desires to go on in a different way, it has simply to decline to adopt the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But does it not put it in the power of the committee to pit one class of legislation against another, and in that way defeat the will of the majority of the House on any particular legislation?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Not at all. The idea of my friend is very far-fetched, that the lodgment of this power with the Committee on Rules would enable that committee to say what should or should not be considered. He might argue with some degree of plausibility that under this power the Committee on Rules might perhaps favor certain measures against others, but when he undertakes to say that the Committee on Rules would or would not use this power to prevent the consideration of business, I say that he has placed a very far-fetched construction upon it, which I hope is original and I hope exclusive.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have said all that is necessary to be said in regard to that rule. Gentlemen who have had experience for years here understand that it becomes absolutely necessary that some committee or some portion of this House should have some power as to the arrangement of the order of business. There would be chaos without it. There is nothing new in that idea. Such power has always been given to some committee, and ever since I have been in Congress that power has been lodged in the Committee on Rules; but as every one who has had experience knows, it has required unanimous consent for the consideration of these special orders.

I do not believe myself, Mr. Speaker, that if the House shall agree to this amendment that the times will be very frequent when the power will be exercised to the extent of declaring the exact time, hour, and day when a vote shall be had.

The next amendment, Mr. Speaker, to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that to Rule XXI, which is commonly spoken of as the "Holman amendment," originating, as I am informed, with my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who sits upon my left, and which was a rule of this House, I believe, from the Forty-fourth Congress down to and including the Forty-eighth Congress. Certainly it was a rule of the House in the Forty-eighth Congress. In proposing it to the House I will state that we have used the exact language found in the rule in the Forty-eighth Congress. The effect of that rule, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, and I gather my idea entirely from reading it, because I was not here when it was in force, is to give to a committee of appropriations—I do not mean the Committee on Appropriations, but any committee which has authority to report any appropriation bill—the right to change existing law where such change would be germane to the proposition before that committee, and at the same time would have the effect of retrenching expenses.

It was believed, Mr. Speaker, by the majority of the Committee on Rules that this House ought to have the power, if it in its judgment sees fit, to reduce expenses; and knowing how business is transacted here, we felt that unless that power was conferred upon these appropriation committees it could not be exercised at all substantially. I mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that if no salary could be reduced, if no retrenchment could be had except upon a special bill introduced and passed for that purpose under our mode of business and with the great rush of business here, it would be impossible to pass such bills at all. So it was believed by the Committee on Appropriations, who pressed this subject upon us, and to whom we must largely look for these measures of retrenchment wherever they can be made, that that power should be given them, and we concluded, after much consideration and after consultation with gentlemen, that we should go back to the rule of the Forty-eighth Congress and see if it would not work well.

There was some objection urged to it by gentlemen. For instance, it was said that it would surely be impossible to pass these reductions through the Senate. That it would simply lead to a deadlock between the two Houses; but we did not consider that that was any answer to the proposition that the House should have this power, because if the House undertakes faithfully to reduce the expenditures where they should be reduced and the Senate refuses to agree to that reduction, then the fault is with them, and we will be vindicated before the country. We can not predict what the Senate may or may not do. We can only do our duty as we understand it, and it is our duty to see that the expenditures of the Government are reduced in such a way that they do not interfere with the proper working of the various departments of the Government.

The next amendment, Mr. Speaker, and the only one that is to be found in Rule XXVIII, is that which is intended to allow the House to make use of suspension days. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that it was frequently the case that the whole day set apart—being the first and third Mondays of each month—for motions to be made to suspend the rule and pass measures, were taken up by filibustering, and that was done under the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills. A gentleman who desired to prevent the consideration of some motion to suspend the rules could send to the Clerk's desk the Revised Statutes and the whole day could be taken up in reading it, and of course, if demanded, all bills that were introduced here would have to be read.

We propose to cut that off, Mr. Speaker, by providing that on the first and third Mondays of the month, which are known as "suspension days," the call of the States for the introduction of bills shall not exceed one hour. As a matter of fact, after the first two or three Mondays of the session, one hour is ample for that purpose. I think I may safely say that not more than fifteen or twenty minutes would ordinarily be consumed, even at this early stage of the session, on those Mondays in the introduction of bills under the call. Therefore, the committee thought they could safely provide that on suspension days the call should not occupy more than one hour.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have gone briefly over the three amendments which the committee propose, and now I will reserve the balance of my time and yield to any gentleman who desires to take the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. HATCH]. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has two hours and forty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] if he desires to take the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] that under the agreement made in the House the gentleman is recognized as controlling the whole of the time on his side. He has occupied fifteen minutes.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine. Of course the gentleman speaks in his own time.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] does not desire to further explain the rules, I will address the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Not now.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I wish I were able, by some miracle or other display of power, to transfer to this audience at the commencement of the session the wisdom and the experience which they will have at the end of it. If I could do that I should not have before me what I know to be an impossible task, the preservation of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. For the last ten years, as the records will show, I have uplifted my voice many times in favor of such modifications of the rules of the House as would give it the power to put into acts of Congress its wishes.

I have never failed, at the end of a session, to find many men, for whose judgment I had great respect, come to me and express their regret that their knowledge when the subject was up for discussion was not as great as it was after they had seen the rules in operation. If the members of the House could now have the knowledge that will come to them during the session there would be very little difficulty in establishing the proper principles and the proper practice.

I intend to state briefly to the House what the system was that was adopted in the Fifty-first Congress. It will not be necessary for me to go greatly into detail, because a general outline will, I think, show what the plan was sufficiently for the House fairly to judge of the matter.

The introduction of bills before the Fifty-first Congress had always been in the clumsy and unsatisfactory fashion which you have all witnessed, and which it is proposed to continue. In the Fifty-first Congress a system was adopted carrying out and applying to public bills the system which had already been adopted with regard to petitions and private bills. The bills were handed, at any time, to the Clerk, and, under the instruction of the Speaker, were referred in accordance with the will of the House as expressed in rules already framed. If any error was made in a reference, the committee who ought to have it had the right to demand the bill, or the committee who ought not to have it had the right to bring before the House the question whether the duty of considering it should be imposed upon them.

Some objection was made that that seemed to deprive the House of the right of controlling the reference of bills; but that objection was rather technical than real, for the reason that the House had already defined the directions in which it intended the bills to go, and in the early days, when bills were referred publicly and openly, the proposition to refer to another committee than the one deemed suitable by the Speaker was not only of rare occurrence, but of the very rarest. In fact, I may say that, according to my recollection, in the early years in which I was in Congress no such question of reference was ever raised except once or twice. But now, as gentlemen can see every day, there is growing up the very bad practice of referring bills by the House in defiance of its own rules, and I have myself witnessed the beautiful transaction of the reference of a bill on eduction, not to the Committee on Education, but to the Committee on Labor. And this, past experience shows, is sure to increase, and the inevitable result will be confusion and disorder. So that the total result of the proposed change backward is the consumption of the time of the House, the annoyance of the House, and an exceedingly irregular reference of bills.

I can conceive no reason why this rule, established by the Fifty-first Congress, was broken in upon, except that conservatism which preserves so much bad while it saves somewhat of good. When a bill went to a committee, that committee reported it for reference in a similar manner; and the bill was sent to the Calendar to which it belonged, and then was acted upon under the rules of the House. But the House found itself, as it will always find itself, with an amount of business which it was impossible for it to transact, and there must be, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] has well said, some committee charged with the duty of selecting, in regard to the important matters, what questions shall be presented to the House. That part of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress was a source of great uproar, opposition, and confusion at one time. Gentlemen expressed themselves against it with great vehemence and multitudinous iteration. I do not speak of that in any reproachful way, but simply as a reminder, in order that the country may see what I am glad to be able to describe as satisfactory progress on the part of the Democratic party. [Laughter.]

I hail every advance of the Democratic party with very great satisfaction, because I am a sincere believer in the doctrine that in order to have an army take a new march the rear guard must be got up. I do not say this in any reproachful fashion; I simply say that the conservative element of the country must be reasonably convinced of the propriety of one advance before it is safe for the community to take another. Therefore, the amendment which has been presented by this committee in regard to the power of the Committee on Rules as to the control of business in the House I hail as a very great advance. I am glad to know that it has ceased to be "tyranny" for that committee to present bills for the consideration of the House, and that henceforth we shall have some governing and responsible power in the House, even if it is not all we could desire; for although some reform has taken place, and although the principle for which we contended has been practically admitted in this amendment from the Committee on Rules, yet I am sorry to say it has been presented in so one-sided a fashion, that I really entertain the hope that the House may see the propriety of extending the principle and giving it full course, that it may be glorified.

Gentlemen of the House will have observed that under the proposed system of rules reported by the gentleman from Mississippi the Committee on Rules has a right of way; everything else must be side-tracked when the Committee on Rules presents a proposition with regard to procedure in this House. That is right; that gives to the Committee on Rules a general direction of the business of the House; and it will be noticed that when that committee have their opportunity, then all dilatory motions, after one motion to adjourn, must be stopped and the House must be brought directly to a vote upon the subject. This is beyond what we did.

Now, mark you, the Committee on Rules, when they propose a procedure of business, have a right to dictate the terms on which that proceeding shall take place, and consequently they can by the very rule which they bring in stop filibustering proceedings against that particular measure. In other words, this committee, whenever they choose to present a proposition to the House, may enable the House to exercise what used to be called "tyranny" over the House and over the single member, but which is now regarded, justly, as good procedure. Now, my difficulty with this matter is this: Whenever the Committee on Rules choose to present a proposition they can cut off dilatory motions and strangle filibustering. So far as it goes that is good; but the majority of the House ought to have at all times the same right and the same privilege as to all bills, once up, which they are to have in the case of those bills which shall receive the sanction of the Committee on Rules.

Wherever the Committee on Rules choose to act in that repressive fashion, filibustering and every dilatory motion can be cut off; and what are so erroneously called "the rights of minorities" may be absolutely taken away. But when it comes to a matter which a mere majority of the House, without the concurrence of the Committee on Rules, desire to pass, all the means which can be in the hands of the filibusterer have been placed where he can use them to the best advantage. In other words, the minority may rule in every case except where the Committee on Rules have taken the initiative and demand that the majority shall rule. Under this newly proposed system the will of the majority is to be sacred when it has the Committee on Rules on its side; it is to be of no account when it is not thus supported. And yet I suppose it will be claimed that this system preserves the right of the individual member to an extent unknown for the past two years. Yet after all I shall be surprised if I do find any gentleman so far in the rear as to claim that.

According to this system, if it be carried out in its intent and purpose, the Speaker will be deprived, and through him the House will be deprived, of the right of suppressing that filibustering which uses dilatory motions, which I beg leave to define as meaning any motion presented for the purpose of stopping the business of the House. I say that the House has the right at any time to demand that obstructors of its progressive march in legislation shall be moved out of the way, and shall be moved out of the way by the proper officer of the House representing the House, whose organ he is, whose mouthpiece he is. When the report of the Committee on Rules was presented in the last Congress I ventured to say in that report that the right of the Speaker and his duty to stop dilatory motions would never be exercised until every man in the House knew and was satisfied that the motions were of that character.

I said that the difficulty would be that the Chair would forbear too long. I say so now. I say that the Speaker of this House, the organ of the majority and the organ of the House itself, should not only have the right, but should have the duty imposed upon him to suppress filibustering, just as any other disturbance which obstructs the business of the House should be suppressed. The object of a session of this House is that the people's Representatives may sit in judgment upon those matters which are presented to them by the people. There is no better title for such a body than one corresponding with that noble title given to the Legislature of Massachusetts—"the great and general court" of the nation. I care not whether a question is decided in the affirmative or the negative, the questions which the people present ought to be decided by their Representatives. But the whole system of business here for years and years has been to seek methods of shirking, not of meeting, the questions which the people present for the consideration of their Representatives.

Peculiar circumstances have caused this. For a long time one section of the country largely dominated the other. That section of the country was constantly apprehensive of danger which might happen at any time by reason of an institution which it was maintaining. Very naturally, all the rules of the House were bent for the obstruction of action on the part of Congress. They wanted to be "let alone." And when in the Forty-sixth Congress a revision of the rules was proposed, it found the Republican party in very much the same condition. They wanted what had been done during the war kept from repeal; and the consequence was that in the Forty-sixth Congress we agreed (I believe I was one of those who took part in the agreement) to a set of rules which, for imbecility, for absolute protection against progress, never had their equal on printed white paper. So thoroughly embedded is the idea of obstruction in the rules as we have them here presented, that you can come across these obstructions in the most unexpected places.

Why, under the rules that it is proposed to adopt for this House you will be utterly powerless to call together the House, as the Constitution requires you should, when a quorum has been found not present and make the members act; and we were powerless in the Fifty-first Congress. What we needed then and what you need now is that amendment, that most admirable amendment proposed by that distinguished constitutional lawyer, Mr. Tucker of Virginia, in the Forty-sixth Congress, which I propose to offer as an amendment to the rules of the Fifty-first Congress when offered as a substitute for these proposed rules.

This Tucker amendment provides for the counting as a part of the quorum of all the members brought in under a call of the House whether they vote or not.

Now, one word upon another question, which I do not propose to debate or discuss in any exhaustive way, but simply to allude to briefly, and that is the question of what constitutes a quorum of the House of Representatives. It is not in the least necessary for me to discuss that question.

The Supreme Court of the United States will soon, I hope, pass upon it. I entertain the unfaltering faith that the Supreme Court of the United States will follow the decisions of every supreme court and of every justice of every supreme court of the States of the Union that has ever passed upon it in these United States. I repeat it: I have no doubt the Supreme Court of the United States will follow the universal and unanimous judgment of every supreme court of every State in the United States that has ever passed upon this subject, and that is, that a quorum of this body is constituted by the members who are here present; that if there be a majority of the members present, the body is constituted, and the body itself has no right to say that it shall not do business.

I see in his seat the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and I am quite sure that he agrees with me, as he did a dozen years ago in his presentation of the case to that effect. To have the support of such a gentleman as the Representative (now Senator) from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN, the then Representative from Virginia, Mr. Tucker, and the present chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, will overpower, with the assistance of the supreme courts that I have mentioned, even my own feeble opinion to the contrary delivered more than ten years ago. [Laughter.] I remember that opinion, which was quoted against me in the Fifty-first Congress, and to which quotation I never replied. Perhaps the indulgence of the House will permit me now to make a statement a moment long in regard to it.

I never replied to the quotation at the time, because I thought, notwithstanding the kindly words of praise which were ringing in all Democratic newspapers, and the exaltation to imperial heights which they were kind enough to give me [laughter], that a great constitutional question like that should not be degraded into the question whether I was consistent or not. [Laughter.] It really seemed to me, even under the lifting influences of these varied remarks and allusions, that that question of consistency was trivial as compared with the truth. But I had at that far distant time my own ideas about it, from not the slightest examination, and in the hurry and rush of debate I said "it would seem" to be a sufficient answer to speak as I did. I am quite sure when I make a personal statement I shall be believed by the members of this House. For in regard to that opinion I had already begun to have some doubts, and that that expression, "it would seem," was put in purposely and intentionally, and that I said I preferred to discuss it on another ground, because in my judgment other ground was more tenable. For while I had before thus carelessly held the doctrine, yet after the disaster which happened to us in Maine, arising from the so-called "State steal," I found that some people who had already maintained the doctrine of a quorum, which is occasionally sustained by the Democratic party, were not quite willing to try it on in a matter which would go to the courts, and not having had thereafter an opportunity to examine it, I put in the words "it would seem."

I also took occasion to defend filibustering. Now, it is the misfortune of language that the same word is used often to describe the animal in two different stages, one when a very pleasant and harmless kitten, and afterwards when it becomes a very ferocious animal, running wild. [Laughter.] The filibustering I then defended was quite defensible, but filibustering had grown in the time, and before the time of the Fifty-first Congress, to be utterly indefensible, and I hope you will see it is in this Congress.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, if you adopt these rules you will find somebody in some minority, not necessary political, who, under circumstances of great passion, will avail themselves of all the weapons which God and nature have placed in their hands. I do not refer to the Democratic party by the first expression; perhaps the latter will cover them and make the quotation endurable [laughter], albeit it is not of savory memory.

There is one other proposition which is made here upon which I desire to make some comment. It is a proposition which is dear to the heart of what is called retrenchment and reform, about which the greatest thing, as my colleague intimated the other day, is usually the sign outside the tent. That is a proposition by which riders may be attached to appropriation bills, provided they diminish expenditures. That proposition was originally introduced into the rules in the first fervor of new Democratic control of the House in 1874, or the Congress which followed that election. It was tried, found wanting, and dismissed, by a Democratic House, I think. At any rate it was thoroughly tried and found wanting by two of these bodies, and is now resuscitated, after its features have become so sodden by death that it is hoped nobody will quite recognize them, and it is hoped they may be palmed off upon us as something useful and valuable.

Now, in the first place I have a great contempt for anything which lowers the dignity and power of this House, and I do not care whether it is something the House proposes to do itself or not. The power which you take away from yourselves of making your appropriations in either direction, up or down, is a power that you can not take away from the Senate. You propose to limit your right to amend the propositions of the chairman of a Committee on Appropriations only in the upward direction. If you think any more money ought to be appropriated, you can not appropriate it; but if you can hitch on a proposition to take off some money, it does not matter what performance you tack to it.

The result is that most obnoxious and unhallowed thing, legislative riders upon appropriation bills. They are provocative of contest, of difficulty with the other branch, and trouble from beginning to end. And you will find that the character and quality of the amendments that are to be offered by the ruling classes in this House can be determined by noticing who is put in the chair; for we do not have any permanent Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, and the result is that the question of what is germane and what reduces expenditures is as interesting as any variegated landscape that you ever beheld. The rules of the Fifty-first Congress limited the Committee of the Whole. I always thought that was a mistake. I always felt that if we can not trust the majority of the House of Representatives we certainly can not trust anybody. The Constitution trusts them, the people trust them, and the only thing is that they do not trust themselves.

Let me remind you in concluding—for I have taken more time than I anticipated—that this is not entirely a partisan body; that on the great bulk of questions that are passed upon the lines of division do not run along party lines; that outside of politics there are many men in either party who are in favor of progress and of that record of it which is to be found in the legislation of a country; and if control is given, as under these rules it is given in all cases that do not have the sanction of the Committee on Rules, to the minority, it will be impossible for the majority of this House to effectually act.

I sincerely hope that this House will give to this subject a candid attention, free from partisanship, and with a willingness to follow in the line of those gentlemen who believe that the rules of the Fifty-first Congress were not only good for them when they were in the majority, but who believe that they are good for them now in the minority, and who are ready to follow them wherever they legitimately lead. Such a course, we having borne all the odium, we having borne all the disaster connected with it—such a course is for you perfectly easy.

You can give this country a House of Representatives free to transact its business, a House of Representatives with the power which the Constitution gives it, and of which no man has an honorable right to deprive it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER protempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] occupied thirty-two minutes. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is recognized.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, if there are other gentlemen of the Committee on Rules who would like to discuss the report generally I can wait until they shall conclude, inasmuch as I am disposed simply to speak to an amendment offered by myself on yesterday to section 51 of Rule XI, which is found in the RECORD of to-day, and is as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures shall have leave to report at any time on bills relating to the coinage of silver.

The amendment which I propose would be appropriate at that place in paragraph 51, immediately preceding the italicised words.

Mr. Speaker, many of us shall be wiser after the rules are adopted than we are now concerning their practical operation, as was suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. The committee which prefers bills for raising revenue and taxing the people has always been, and will continue to be, in parliamentary designation, a privileged committee. The same may be said of the various committees which formulate appropriation bills providing for the disbursement of tax money. Certain other committees are usually, and will again be, clothed with the authority to report the results of their deliberations at any time. The right of way is opened and the track of legislative consideration is cleared before them.

Now, should not a committee charged with the jurisdiction and responsibility of inaugurating and recommending legislation concerning the money supply, providing the means whereby taxes may be paid and appropriations discharged, be invested with similar power? In the present condition of financial disturbance, monetary stringency, industrial depression, and seething popular discontent, are not these committees equal in dignity and public importance; and does there exist any substantial reason why equal facility should not be afforded for the consideration of proposed legislation, coming from these respective committees? To practically apply these questions and to emphasize the situation which confronts the Congress and the country I have proposed the amendment which was submitted on yesterday, and which, if adopted, will make it possible to have prompt and timely action upon a question of the utmost importance in the public mind in the event a majority of the committee having the matter in charge shall report the same to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am admonished by my former service here and my experience while once a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures that unless the power now suggested shall be conferred it may be rendered exceedingly difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to obtain appropriate legislation at this session of Congress concerning the question of silver coinage. Old members and parliamentary tacticians well understand how exceedingly easy it is to suppress and stifle the efforts of an unprivileged committee for recognition, and how various are the methods that can be resorted to in order to defeat consideration of its measures, and more especially so when there may exist in influential quarters strong antagonisms and sharp diversity of opinion concerning the propriety and policy of such measures. None know better than they that a caucus, if convened at all, does not always reflect the real sentiment of a majority of its members nor the desire of the masses of the people.

Mr. Speaker, the signs of the times are unwisely interpreted, the gravity of the situation is uncomprehended, and the movements on the chessboard of political activity are misunderstood by those who suppose that the forces for and against the free and unlimited coinage of silver have declared a truce; that the battlefield and the methods of the campaign are unselected and undetermined, or that any repose will come to an anxious and agitated public until the issue shall be fiercely joined, resolutely waged, and finally decided, and that, too, in the field of open warfare, where every Representative must stand uncovered before the gaze of a quickened American constituency. Overcautious calculations in expediency, hesitations as to policy, timid misgivings as to results, fears of exposure of party division, forebodings as to the consequences upon personal political ambition and the fortune and standing of any particular man or set of men, doubts and predictions as to the influence to be exerted on any especial locality, effects upon the coming Presidential campaign, probabilities of veto, suggestions of delay, all self-serving, time-serving, and tactical maneuvering, are silenced beneath the swelling voice and earnest demand of a wronged and resolute public who believe their cause is just and possess a determination equal to the emergency. They intend their plaint shall be heard.

Mr. Speaker, the power of taxing the people and their ability and means with which to pay taxes go hand in hand. They are correlated, and are to the enginery of government what water and fire are to the locomotive. The one is useless and inoperative without the other. The cruel, barbaric rule of making bricks without straw has no place in the polity of free government. That is a poor political party which has but one idea; it is but a temporary makeshift and can not long endure. Sixty-five millions of people, with vast elaborations of resources and possibilities, with untold and diversified industries, will not and ought not to be content with one single line of legislation nor satisfied with the policies of a few men.

There are questions and questions the solution of which is forced upon legislative attention; intense, aggressive, unyielding questions, which will break through every barrier that excludes them from the considerate notice of the true representatives of the people. I would not minify; on the contrary, I would magnify the necessity and importance of reducing taxation. I would even concede its primacy, but at the same time I would sacrifice no tenet of political faith and practice, the failure to observe which must inevitably work disaster to the cause of good government, sound economy, stable currency, and the success of my party. No commandment in the decalogue of patriotic fidelity and party devotion can be infracted or disregarded without peril. There can be no successful trifling with, nor evasion of, a great and vital question.

Retribution will surely follow. In any party the sin will be discovered and the sinner brought to judgment. If this Democratic House of Representatives, with its immense majority, shall fail to signalize its advent to power by the passage of a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, popular condemnation, in my humble judgment, can not be escaped, and the responsibility for such failure can not be transferred nor avoided.

The people are better advised and more alert than erst they were, and no weather-beaten, threadbare excuses will be in order before the bar of public reason. Certain great, conspicuous, mountainous facts, conditions, and conclusions challenge the concern and awaken the profoundest solicitude of the American people. They believe that the demonetization of silver was surreptitiously and covertly, if not fraudulently, accomplished against their interest in 1873; that the time-honored and ancient law, sanctioned by the wisdom of the fathers and crystallized by the experience of more that eighty years, which opened the mints of the Government, in just equation, to the great money metals of the centuries, was ruthlessly trampled under foot: that the revival and restoration of this law is in keeping with the Constitution, and dictated by considerations of sound financial policy; that for nineteen years the statute books of the country have been blurred and blotted with little less than a condonation of the vice of demonetization, in which silver has been degraded to a mere article of traffic, and that Congress owes it to itself, to the country, and the integrity of legislation to reënact the law as it was aforetime.

The people know that the money supply is inadequate to the demands of business and the betterment of prices to those who deal in the plain and simple transactions of life. They know that they do not suitably profit in that wherein they labor. They realize the crushing, grinding force and truth of the postulate that "scarce money means scant pay." They believe that the free and unrestricted coinage of silver will restore the silver dollar to parity with the gold dollar; that, in homely phraseology, it will "make times easier;" that it will increase the volume of money in the United States; that it will discourage discriminations against silver; that it will call the country back to just conceptions of what money is, the traditional and constitutional methods of its issuance, and silence the visionary schemes of fiatism; that it will be the readoption of the great American policy of bimetallism, the influence of which will extend beyond our shores, and hasten the period of international monetary coöperation. More than all, sir, infinitely above and beyond all, it will be right.

When this amendment shall come to be voted upon I hope no friend of silver will hesitate as to his action. It is but fortifying for the conflict and equipping ourselves in the cause of the people. All our vigilance and all our courage are in demand, and their highest exhibition is earnestly invited. The sooner we know "how the audit stands," the better it will be. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has occupied fifteen minutes of his time.

Mr. LANHAM. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. REED was recognized.

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to make a speech or much of an argument. I rise to gain, if I can, some information as to the meaning of one of these rules. I am in favor of retrenchment and reform, as much so as any member can be who has as many harbors in his district as I have to provide for, as much so as any gentleman from Texas or from Louisiana, from New York or from Florida. [Laughter.] I am in favor of reform—on their part. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, my people want some appropriations for their harbors. In that respect I suppose we differ from others. Now, then, if I understand this rule aright, unless I can get a "pull" on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I ain't "in it," nor our harbors either. [Laughter.] Do I understand it aright?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS. Then, if I understand it correctly, eight members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors can, under this rule, control every appropriation for rivers and harbors. This House is credited with having over three hundred members, but all the rest will have to sit here powerless. If I understand the English language as it appears in this rule, that is what it means. Does this body propose to bind itself in that way? Now my district demands that if its member can not get around and get into the Committee on Rivers and Harbors it shall at least have a show on the floor of the House to propose an amendment. As the rule stands to-day, the fifteen members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors can get their heads together and shut us all out and parcel the whole business out among themselves. [Laughter]. Is that the rule you are going to adopt? Here is the last river and harbor bill, which made over four hundred different appropriations for rivers and harbors, and I tell you it is a study. [Laughter].

Now, I want some "show;" that is, my district wants some show. [Laughter.] The harbors that need improving in the district which I represent want to be considered here, and they want some show on the floor of the House, if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors won't give it to them. I believe that every member of this House should have an opportunity accorded him to represent the wishes of his district on this floor, but under this rule——

Mr. RAINES. And if the committee do let you in and don't give you enough you want to "raise" them.

Mr. BOWERS. Exactly. "That's what's the matter."

A MEMBER. To "call" them.

Mr. BOWERS. I will "call" them if it suits me, if I hold a good hand. [Laughter.] If I don't, I won't "put up." [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask whether I am not right in my understanding of the rule, and if I am, it means that eight members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors can control absolutely every appropriation for such purposes.

Mr. CATCHINGS was recognized and yielded twenty minutes to Mr. RAYNER.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in reply to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has said with reference to his proposed amendment, and in saying which he covered a good deal more ground than is included within his amendment. I realize the ominous fact that these bills looking to the free and unlimited coinage of silver will receive the support of a large number of my party colleagues, and however distasteful it may be to me to differ from them upon so vital an issue, I want thus early to announce my dissent with the most positive and unmistakable utterance that I can give it.

My convictions upon this subject are so decided, that I can not afford to maintain a silence which might be construed into an acquiescence in any part or portion of the doctrine that has swept down upon this House and linked its judgment to what, to my mind, is as unsound a heresy as any that ever made its appearance in any intelligent representative assembly. History has been read in vain, the cardinal doctrines of political economy have been entirely misapprehended, and the experience of every country on the globe that uses gold and silver as a circulating medium has been misconstrued, if there be any semblance of logic in the propositions advanced by the gentleman from Texas.

Now, what is proposed to be done? We contemplate, in response to what we conceive to be a public want, to increase the currency of the country and to supply the people with an additional volume of money. What sort of money do we propose to give them? A stable, standard coin that is actually worth the price that we impress upon it? Not at all. An uncertain fluctuating medium that we intend to artificially appreciate, against the coinage of which the doors of every European mint has been closed for a period of over thirteen years, and which is repudiated as a standard of value in every well-regulated commercial government of the world. How do we propose to distribute this luxury? As emergency may require it, so as to keep the metals at a corresponding value?

Not at all. It is to be unlimited in point of time and uncircumscribed in point of quantity; so that not only the entire output of the American market, the increasing product of the Mexican mines, but all the circulating silver of Europe that can possibly be spared, and all the silver from all the earth in every place and quarter where it can be found, as quickly as it can be gathered, is to be brought to the American mint and stamped with the ensign of the Republic. Standing here, not as the spokesman of any creditor class or moneyed interest, but as a Representative of the people, I deprecate and denounce this headlong scheme. If we were here, Mr. Speaker, legislating for some revolutionary republic of Central America, or if it was incumbent upon us to find a more profitable market for the mining camps of Colorado and Nevada, we might perhaps be justified in adopting a temporary expedient of this character.

But when you tell me that you propose to make this Republic the outlet and the asylum for the unlimited silver coinage of the world, then I say to you that when the people understand this matter and realize what you propose to do they will submerge your bills, with all their hollow hopes and pretexts, beneath the torrent of their disapproval.

Mr. DUNGAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNGAN. Is it proper that in a discussion on the rules we should be compelled to hear a discussion on the tariff and of free coinage?

Mr. RAYNER. I have not said anything about the tariff.

Mr. DUNGAN. You have discussed free coinage.

Mr. RAYNER. I am answering the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state in response to the point of order that he thinks the gentleman from Maryland is proceeding in order. The gentleman will proceed without interruption.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of bimetallism in the true meaning and acceptation of the term. I am opposed to the monometallism of gold; I am opposed to the monometallism of silver. I am in favor of bimetallism, recognizing the two metals according to the Constitution as intended by the framers of that instrument.

But what does this new school of finance and philosophy teach us? Why, that this Government can arbitrarily fix the price of 129 cents an ounce as the value of bullion silver when in the markets of London, Frankfort, Vienna, and New York it is actually worth only a dollar an ounce, and that when we accomplish this wonderful feat the governments of Europe will retain at home all their silver, which is worth only a dollar an ounce, rather than coin it in the American mints at the enormous profit of 29 cents an ounce.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to explain to us why it is that 70 cents' worth of silver coined into a dollar seems actually to be worth for the purposes of business 100 cents?

Mr. RAYNER. I will explain that before I am through if you will allow me to finish. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LANHAM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAYNER. No; I must finish what I was about to say. Once, in the Fiftieth Congress, when I submitted to questions in this way, the debate resolved itself into nothing except a series of questions and answers. I will finish what I desire to say in ten or twelve minutes, and then, if the House will permit me, I will answer every question which gentlemen may desire to put to me on this subject; I will try to do so at any rate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as the result of this illogical syllogism we are told that when we are exporting all of our own gold and importing everybody else's silver, the cheaper metal will not drive the dearer metal from circulation; that gold will not be demonetized or held at a premium; that we shall not be brought to a silver basis, but that the effect will be to keep the two metals close together at a parity in the American market. I regret to say that I can not become a follower of this faith or a proselyte to this sect. To accept it we would be compelled to unlearn everything we have ever learned on this subject, to repudiate the universal experience of centuries, and to apply the flames to that great library of learning and instruction that has been bequeathed to us by the ablest economists from the academies of France and the seminaries of Germany and Great Britain, as the torch was once applied by a Roman emperor to an ancient temple, consuming its untold treasures of knowledge and depriving the rising generation of the collected literature of the ancient world.

It has been lately said, however, by a distinguished gentleman upon the floor of Congress that it would be no detriment whatever to place this Government upon a financial status corresponding with that of the Government of China; that the balance of trade with China is against us, and that this is entirely due to the fact that silver is the circulating medium of that Empire. And with equal emphasis he proclaimed that the fall of prices is entirely due to the demonetization of silver; that what the people are clamoring for is a depreciated currency in which to pay their debts, regardless of the purchasing power which the currency possesses. To use his own language: "We need not go a bowshot from this Capitol to find human nature in all the walks of life suffering for the want of money." He might have added that you need not leave the Capitol at all to find human nature suffering from the want of money. And I would like to add by way of peroration that all the money you can flood the world with will never relieve human nature from the sufferings that it undergoes for the want of money.

If every silver mine on this earth were drained to the last vestige of its treasure and every vein and stratum exhausted, and the whole supply freely coined at the American mints, not one substantial particle of wealth would be bestowed upon the citizens of this Kepublic; not by the slightest fraction would it increase the currency of the country, and no possible benefit would be conferred upon any class of people except the syndicates, who are deriving an enormous profit from the product of their mines, which, by usurping the right of eminent domain, they have monopolized and alienated from the people, to whom they belong by every law of nature and justice.

If I had the time, Mr. Speaker, and it were possible to change the conclusion that a majority of my political colleagues have reached on this subject, I would discuss it along the whole line of the controversy. I would call your attention to the fact that, pass whatever laws you may, enact such statutes as you choose, yet your balances must still be paid in gold, and if not actually paid in gold coin, that they must be adjusted and measured by the standard of gold; because, as has been said over and over again, there can be and will be but one standard, and gold is that standard with the consent of all civilized nations.

I would call your attention to the fact that while we require less money per capita for a circulating medium than any other country on the face of the globe, we have to-day a greater circulation than any European country, with the possible exception of France. I would remind you again of the fact that the articles of the Latin Union have expired by limitation, and that the terms of the treaty are only in force by the voluntary acquiescence and at the revocable will of the contracting parties, and that the time must speedily come when the accredited representatives of the gold and silver nations of the world will meet together in conference for the determination of this the greatest of all international questions which concerns the interests of their constituents.

But, Mr. Speaker, what is the use of argument when the verdict of this side of the House has been determined upon? There is one thing in conclusion, however, that I will say, for the time will come later on during the session when we will have an opportunity to discuss this question in full, and what I say now has been only brought about by what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has said in the course of his discussion.

Pass whatever laws you may, there is one thing that will take place, and that is, that the laborer will never participate in any of the benefits arising from such measures. The laborer will be compelled to receive his compensation in a depreciated currency that has enhanced to him the price of every article of the commodities that he must purchase. When the Legislature of Wisconsin, in the resolution which was recently adopted, proclaimed that those who toil will be the last to receive the benefit and the first to feel the influence of the rise in the price of commodities, it simply announced a law as unchangeable and as inexorable as the laws of nature.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said that these bills must be passed from a party standpoint. This I utterly deny. Viewed from a political standpoint it is a glaring blunder, for it will be impossible to rectify it. We dare not and we will not place in our party platform in the next national contest a resolution declaring for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. The colors that bore any such "strange device" as that would become the harbinger and signal of defeat.

Let me say to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Speaker, that there is one quality of statesmanship that in this country attracts to itself respect and the confidence of the people. It is not diplomacy, it is not popularity, it is not even ability; it is courage—the courage of a man in public life to stand by his convictions. He might be wrong, but if with steadfast purpose he swerves neither to the right nor to the left, why the people prefer him to one who trims his sails with every passing wind and becomes the pliant slave of caprice and fortune. It does not require a great degree of moral courage to proclaim "I would rather be right than President," but it does require a high quality of heroism to declare that "if public opinion be the standard of right or wrong, then I would rather be wrong than be President."

In 1888 a Democratic President, upon the great issue of tariff reform, with more than Roman courage, cut the bridges down when he could easily have purchased victory at the sacrifice of honor. He was struck down facing the enemy. Far better is an honorable defeat in an honorable cause than a corrupt victory by dishonorable means. To-day he is stronger than all the political forces that are arrayed against him. He will rise above the machinery of our conventions, and with the abiding confidence that I have in the principles of my party, with the fervent hope that I cherish that the hour of our deliverence is approaching, let me counsel you and appeal to you to abandon this hazardous undertaking, which will only environ us with difficulties and which will imperil the leadership of him who after twenty-four years of exile led our hosts to triumph, and who shall again, by the intelligent suffrages of our countrymen, be called upon to shape and guide the destinies of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have been out for a moment and happened to come in——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that, under the agreement made, the gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] controls the time on that side, and the Chair is compelled to recognize him.

Mr. BLAND. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is entirely unnecessary. I would be willing to yield, but I think the gentlemen upon the other side ought to take some of their time.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] will allow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to discuss this rule now under consideration. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLAND. I will not require over ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The gentleman from Mississippi will take care of his time; but I really think the gentlemen on the other side ought to discuss this question somewhat.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, can not the gentleman bring forward some one on that side who is in favor of this report? Seriously, we would be glad to hear something said upon the subject of the rules before we reply.

Mr. LANHAM. We have been discussing a very interesting question.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think gentlemen on the other side ought in all fairness to consume some of their time before we proceed any further.

Mr. ENLOE. Can not the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] set up a target for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to shoot at?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I hope gentlemen on the other side will proceed.

Mr. BLAND. Inasmuch as it seems I can not get the floor at this time, I will take some future occasion to reply.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, it is to be deeply deplored that at this time any other question should be dragged into this debate except the discussion of this code of rules. I shall not follow gentlemen in the discussion of any question outside of this report. The Committee on Rules, intrusted with the duty of framing a code of procedure for the Fifty-second Congress, have been unable to agree. A majority of that committee report to this House and recommend the adoption of the rules of the Fiftieth Congress.

The minority of the committee report and recommend the adoption of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. These two systems of rules are before the House for examination and judgment, and it is essential to intelligent action upon either that we should come to a clear understanding of their provisions in detail. The members of the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses who are now members of this Congress are perfectly familiar with the practical workings of the two systems; but gentlemen who honor us for the first time with their presence in the National House of Representatives can not be expected to understand the practical effect of these two codes on legislation. Let me say in the beginning that this question is one of vital importance to this body as a whole and to its individual membership, and upon the decision of this question hinges the legislative achievements of the Fifty-second Congress.

The dominant party in this House stands committed before the country to certain general legislation. Individual members are interested and pledged to the passage of measures in which their constituencies are particularly interested; but whether this body redeems those pledges or whether the individual membership of this House shall ever have a hearing on this floor on behalf of the measures in which their constituencies are interested depends entirely upon the vote you give upon the report now before you for consideration. The people have a right to demand and your constituencies have a right to insist that these pledges shall be redeemed; and any failure on the part of the dominant party or of the individual to perform and keep faith with the people will result in public condemnation.

I think it will be agreed upon all hands that a system of rules ought to be adopted under which the majority can transact business, and that no system of rules should be adopted, nor should this House fasten upon itself such fetters, that the minority can at will control legislation. To give the minority the power to control a legislative body nullifies the will of the people and destroys popular government. This thought was so well expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that I can not refrain from quoting his exact words:

There are two points—

He said, in reference to a revision of the rules of the House, one or the other of which must be observed. One is to make rules to obstruct legislation and the other is to revise the rules so that a majority of this House can crystallize the will of the American people into law.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] further said very aptly:

The difficulty that the rules now throw—and he is speaking of the same system of rules we are now considering—

The difficulty that the rules now throw in the way of a majority of the House—it makes no difference which party has it—of giving its views the force of law is almost insurmountable.

* * * * * * *

I hope, if the House grants permission to the committee to sit during recess, the committee will take that part of the subject into consideration, and endeavor so to simplify the rules that the majority can make their will the law, so far as the action of the House is concerned.

That is the language of the gentleman from Texas, and I cite it because it is directly in point upon this question. The majority of a legislative body must rule, and whenever the majority cease to rule there is but one step beyond it, and that is revolution. Now, as I have said, both these systems of rules are before the House. Both have been tried. It is not a matter of speculation as to the practical workings of these two systems. It is a matter susceptible of demonstration. Now, I affirm that the system of rules which you propose, if adopted, will impede business instead of advancing it, and under it a half dozen members of this House, nay, any two members, can take the majority by the throat and stop all legislation during the entire session of this Congress. I make the statement, without fear of contradiction, that under the system of rules proposed by the majority of the Committee on Rules no business can be transacted except by unanimous consent.

This system of rules was tried in the Fiftieth Congress, a Democratic body, presided over by that accomplished parliamentarian Mr. CARLISLE of Kentucky, who would have found a way to have executed these rules and advance the public business under them if it had been possible to do so. Let me give you a single instance of the practical workings of these rules, and I do this for those who are not familiar with it. The Democratic Committee on the Judiciary in the Fiftieth Congress reported to the House a bill to refund the direct tax. That bill, under the rules, was placed on the Calendar. Repeated efforts were made to reach the bill for consideration, and as often as the effort was made just so often it failed. Finally, the Committee on Rules, clothed with power to report to the House any modification of the rules or a special order, on the 2d day of April submitted a special order setting apart the 3d and 4th days of April for the consideration of what is known as the "direct-tax bill."

Bear in mind the majority of the House was Democratic, the House was presided over by a Democrat, a Democratic committee reporting the bill favorably to the House, the majority of the House anxious to pass it, and a special order passed for its consideration. On the 2d day of April the special order was offered, and after some filibustering was finally passed. The 3d day of April came for the consideration of the bill by virtue of the special order. All the 3d day of April was wasted in filibustering motions. On the 4th day of April the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House under the special order for the consideration of the direct-tax bill. Now, I want to read you a little scene from that farce which was enacted under these rules, and you will observe that there are some very conspicuous characters figuring in the drama:

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering, under the special order of the 20th instant, the bill of the Senate (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and of the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861;
Pending which
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved that when the House, in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, resumed the consideration of said bill, all general debate thereon be limited to one hour;
Pending which
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR demanded the previous question.
And the question being put, namely, Shall the previous question be ordered? it was decided in the affirmative.

That was taken on a yea-and-nay vote. Then—

Mr. Turner moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.
Pending which
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved to lay the motion on the table; and the question being put, Will the House agree to it? it was decided in the affirmative.

That, too, on a yea-and-nay vote.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

* * * * * * * *

The question then recurring upon the motion to limit the debate;
Pending which
Mr. OATES moved the House adjourn; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative.

* * * * * * * *

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mind you, the yeas and nays were called on all these motions.

The question again recurring on the motion to limit debate, and being put, Will the House agree thereto? it was decided in the affirmative.

* * * * * * *

So the motion to limit the debate was agreed to.
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas moved to reconsider the vote last taken;
Pending which
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.
And the question being put, namely, Will the House agree thereto? it was decided in the affirmative.

* * * * * * *

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

* * * * * * *

The question then recurring upon the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union;
Pending which
Mr. OATES moved that the House take a recess until 5 o'clock p. m.;
Pending which
Mr. Weaver moved to amend the motion of Mr. OATES for a recess by striking out the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "four;"
Pending which,
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas moved to amend by striking out the word "four" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "half past four;"
Pending which,
Mr. Weaver moved that the House adjourn;
And the question being put, namely:
Will the House adjourn?
It was decided in the negative.

The yeas and nays were ordered upon all these motions, and the motion to adjourn was decided in the negative.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas to the motion for a recess; and being put, viz:
Will the House agree thereto?
It was decided in the negative.

* * * * * * *

So the amendment was rejected.
The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. Weaver to the motion for a recess;
Pending which,
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved to amend the motion for a recess by striking out the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "ten o'clock to-morrow morning;"
Pending which,
Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR demanded the previous question;
Pending which,
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas moved that the House adjourn;
Pending which,
Mr. OATES moved that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday next;
Pending which,
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas moved to amend the motion of Mr. OATES by striking out the word "Friday" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Saturday."
And the question being put,
It was decided in the negative.

The yeas and nays were ordered on all these motions.

Mr. REED. Where did all this happen?

Mr. BURROWS. It happened in the Fiftieth Congress, in the House of Representatives, under this code of rules.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman if that bill was not subsequently vetoed by the President?

Mr. BURROWS. Has that anything to do with the question I am now discussing?

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it has.

Mr. BURROWS. Not the remotest. I am demonstrating how a few members of the House are enabled under this proposed code of rules to resist legislation and defeat the majority.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish, if the gentleman will allow me, to say that the question I asked was, if, in view of the action taken by the President, it does not often happen that the hostility and the obstruction that is interposed under the rules is oftentimes of great value?

Mr. BURROWS. Then the gentleman places himself in the attitude of maintaining that the minority shall control the House and all legislation.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can state his own views in his own way.

Mr. BURROWS. I will proceed with this scene in the drama.

So the motion to adjourn over was disagreed to.
The question then recurring upon the motion of Mr. OATES that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday next;
And the question being put, viz:
Will the House agree thereto?
It was decided in the negative.

* * * * * * *

So the motion to adjourn over was disagreed to.
The question then recurring upon the motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas to amend the motion to adjourn over;
And being put,
It was decided in the negative.

And so from the beginning to the end these dilatory motions were repeated. The motions to adjourn, to adjourn over, to take a recess, to take a recess for fifteen minutes, to take a recess for five minutes or ten minutes, and calling the yeas and nays, and thus the minority absolutely arrested the consideration of business under the special order and thwarted the will of the majority.

And let me state that nine full days were consumed in this House under this special order reported from the Committee on Rules, and the House was in actual session during that time for eighty hours. Therefore, if you allow five hours for each day's sitting, the House lost sixteen legislative days upon the simple motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House. There were seventy-five roll-calls upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the business under the special order, and that process of filibustering could have been continued until the close of the session, as the majority of the Committee on Rules fully understand, and as every member of the Fiftieth Congress knows.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him with one remark?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would call his attention to the fact that by that filibustering a seventeen-million-dollar bill was defeated in that Congress which he and his friends passed in the Fifty-first Congress, and which helped to swell their appropriations to a billion dollars. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. And which saved the State of Kentucky from bankruptcy. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] thinks I am discussing that question, then either he has not paid the slightest attention to what I have been saying, or else he can not comprehend my language. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown the practical working of these rules, and I want the new members to adopt them with their eyes wide open, if they adopt them at all. If you do it, gentlemen, I wish you to understand just what the result will be.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rules; has not that committee reported a proposition, which is new, that when any order or any proposition is submitted to the House in respect to its business by the Committee on Rules but one dilatory motion shall be entertained?

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, certainly. The Committee on Rules has taken care of itself.

Mr. OATES. Then I want to hear the gentleman state what effect that rule will have upon legislation, and whether filibustering can be successfully carried on under it.

Mr. BURROWS. Not against the Committee on Rules. I will reach the gentleman's point in a moment. This same order which gave two days to the consideration of the direct-tax bill also gave other days to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the Committee on Territories, the Committee on Public Lands, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Committee on Agriculture, seven other committees; but by this filibustering the order was exhausted as to each and every one of those committees, and their opportunity for a hearing in the House was lost. Now, I want to say, in the face of this demonstration of the practical working of these rules which the majority propose, that any half dozen members of this House can prevent the passage of any bill reported from any committee, whatever may be the wishes of the majority of the body.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question for information?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. STOCKDALE. How can five or six members do that?

Mr. BURROWS. By repeating these dilatory motions.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But it requires one-fifth of the last vote to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, it is not necessary to have the yeas and nays. It is a question of mere physical endurance. Half a dozen members can make these dilatory motions and have them put to the House, and it is a simple question of endurance.

Now, the Committee on Rules understand perfectly well that it is entirely safe to allow the members of this House to indulge the delusion that they are legislating; that it is perfectly safe to appoint committees and assign you gentlemen to duty upon those committees. Your employment there is entirely innocent and harmless. [Laughter.] You can consider any question referred to you in committee, but adopt these rules and you can never have your measures considered in the House except by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules. You will labor week in and week out, month in and month out, in committee, but I want to notify you in advance that that labor will all be wasted unless the Committee on Rules shall happen to signify their willingness that your measures shall be given a hearing on this floor.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. CATCHINGS. How was it during the last Congress? Did every man who wanted to have a bill passed secure its consideration?

Mr. BURROWS. I will call attention to that matter in a few moments. The gentleman asks, as I understand, how we got rid of filibustering in the last Congress?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, I did not ask that question, but whether every member succeeded in getting his bill considered?

Mr. BURROWS. Well, it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. BURROWS. The Committee on Coinage can perfect its measure for the free coinage of silver, which the dominant party, I presume, believes in, and can report it to the House. But will you tell me how you will ever get a hearing for that bill in this House under these rules?

Mr. LANHAM. By adopting the amendment which I have introduced. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. I thank my friend for his suggestion. I did not hear his amendment. The Committee on Mississippi Levees have before them a bill proposing to make an appropriation to levee the Mississippi River and save the property and lives of the people of that great valley. How are you to get a hearing for that bill in this House unless the Committee on Rules in its wisdom——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will my friend answer me why it was that the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River did not get a hearing in the last Congress on a similar bill which was at that time reported?

Mr. BURROWS. Because it was so far down on the Calendar that it could not be reached; that is the reason. Then, there is the World's Fair. How is the committee on that subject going to get an appropriation passed in this House, or even get a hearing on the question? That question can never be heard here, unless the Committee on Rules shall, as has been suggested by my colleague on the committee, adopt a rule setting aside a day for the consideration of the measure and prohibiting in the rule itself all filibustering. But if the Committee on Rules shall see fit in the order which it may report not to prohibit filibustering—if it simply reports a special order for the consideration of the measure—the bill must be exposed to assault all along the line, and its defeat by filibustering can easily be accomplished.

I was a little surprised when I read in the public prints that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in a public speech in New York had said that there would be no legislation on the silver question in this Congress. He must have spoken with the spirit of prophecy or been advised in advance of the system of rules which the Committee on Rules would report. In one word, adopt this system of rules, and I warn you in advance that nothing can be passed except by unanimous consent, or by permission of those who are commonly known as the "leaders" of the majority.

Now, a simple rule in the Fifty-first Congress put an end to all this filibustering, and did it most effectively. This process of filibustering had been carried on under such a rule as that to which I desire to call attention—Rule XVI, clause 5, of this body of rules now reported. That clause provides that "a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, a motion to adjourn, and to take a recess, shall always be in order." Those are the motions which the majority propose shall always be in order. In the Fifty-first Congress we eliminated from our rules that language, and the rule simply read in this way:

The hour to which the House adjourns shall be entered on the Journal.

And then at the end of this rule, as clause 10, was added:

No dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker.

By eliminating from the body of rules the right of any member at any time to move that the House adjourn, or to move a recess, or to move to fix a time to which the House shall adjourn, and by adding that when any subject is under discussion no dilatory motion shall be allowed, we ended the practice of filibustering.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly,

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. How many men were engaged in filibustering against the passage of the bill known as the bill for the refund of the direct tax?

Mr. BURROWS. It is impossible for me now to state.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. There were many more than six or seven?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Then how did it happen that the bill ever passed, if, as the gentleman says, six or seven men could have defeated it?

Mr. BURROWS. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. How did it ever happen that the bill was passed by Congress and vetoed by the President?

Mr. BURROWS. It did not pass at that session.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It passed at the short session of that Congress.

Mr. BURROWS. It did not pass at that session: it was defeated, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] after nine days of filibustering——

Mr. BOUTELLE. It was passed at the next session, under an agreement which was made to allow it to come to a vote.

Mr. BURROWS. After nine days of filibustering by a minority of the majority, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], who made the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, was just where he commenced, and the majority was forced to surrender.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. But the bill did pass at the short session of that Congress.

Mr. BURROWS. It did not pass at the session to which I have referred and in which this filibustering was carried on.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. It passed at the short session.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It passed under an arrangement made presumably after it was learned that the President was going to veto it.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Ah!

Mr. BURROWS. Now I want to call the attention of the House to the criticism which was made upon the rules of the Fifty-first Congress because of the provision that the Speaker should not entertain any dilatory motions. It was urged that to place in the hands of the presiding officer the power of determining whether or not a motion was dilatory was giving him too great power.

In these rules it is provided, in Rule XI, clause 51—and I desire to call your special attention to it—it is provided there, as reported by the committee:

> It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

When any committee of this House outside of the Committee on Rules, or any individual of this House, desires to get a hearing on a proposition in which he is interested, the whole battery of filibustering is opened on that committee or that individual.

It is reserved for the Committee on Rules alone when it makes a report that no dilatory motion shall be allowed to intervene. If it is unsafe to trust the Speaker with the power of determining when a motion is dilatory when committees or individuals are seeking a hearing, is it less dangerous to lodge with the Speaker, who is himself ex officio chairman of a committee, the power to determine when a motion is dilatory? Is that less dangerous? And yet in framing these rules the committee have taken particular pains to shield themselves and their reports and expose the House and its membership to this never-ending power of filibustering.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit me now to ask him a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. BYNUM. Clause 4 of Rule XVI is the rule to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's object, I think, but I want to ask him if in his judgment, by simply eliminating from this clause the right of making the motions to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn and take a recess, it will be possible under the rule so amended to filibuster?

Mr. BURROWS. The power to interpose any dilatory motions will accomplish the same end.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not think so, because the gentleman will see by examining the rule there would be no other motion to alternate with the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS. I have no doubt that that would aid very much.

Mr. REED. Any motion that obstructs business is dilatory.

Mr. BOUTELLE. May there not be other motions to be interposed instead of those which the gentleman seeks to strike out?

Mr. BYNUM. The rule provides what motions may be made.

Mr. BURROWS. As I have said, I have no doubt that that would aid materially in checking filibustering.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have demonstrated that under this system of rules what I said in the beginning is literally true, that no business can be transacted except by unanimous consent or by suspending the operation of the rules. And so the committee has wisely provided in this code of rules that they may be suspended. Having provided for the transaction of business, under which nothing can be done, they then provide that the rules may be suspended, so that something may be done on two Mondays in a month—the first Monday by committees and the second by individuals. And if we remain in session for six months—and we shall probably be in session much longer—the three hundred and thirty members of this body in six months will have six opportunities to move a suspension of the rules, and each individual suspension followed by debate, which the rules permit, for thirty minutes, and then a yea-and-nay vote.

If you are very diligent and waste no time, and on such Mondays protract the session, about twenty-four members will have the opportunity to move a suspension of the rules, providing that they have an understanding with the Speaker, because you never will be recognized until the Speaker is advised what you propose to do, and then you must secure two-thirds of the membership of the House in order to pass your measure.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let me ask the gentleman if that was not the case in the last Congress?

Mr. BURROWS. We had other methods of doing business and were not driven exclusively to suspension of the rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But I am talking now of the individual member. You are pointing out how impossible it is for individual members to succeed in getting measures through under a suspension. I ask if the same condition did not prevail in the last Congress?

Mr. BURROWS. I am simply claiming that under these rules you can do no business except by a suspension, and, as I have said, with diligence there may be twenty-four individuals who, by the consent of the Speaker, may secure recognition and thus obtain a hearing for their measures.

Mr. PAYNE. But dilatory motions are not cut off on suspension day.

Mr. BURROWS. I should say they were, to a certain extent at least. There is one motion to adjourn, and that is all.

Now, the majority of the committee in framing this code has provided one other escape, and but one, in addition to the right to suspend the rules on Monday, and that is that power to which I have just referred, in Rule XI, which exempts the reports of the Committee on Rules from all dilatory motions. Anyone familiar with that practice knows perfectly well that the Committee on Rules will report a special order upon measures which the committee think ought to be considered, and when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], unable to secure a hearing for his bill for free coinage, introduces a proposition or special order and refers it to the Committee on Rules, if in the judgment of that committee the measure ought not to come before the House the proposed order will be suppressed, and the Committee on Rules will take to itself the whole power of determining whether that request shall ever be submitted to the House for its judgment.

Mr. LANHAM. Does not the gentleman think it would be better——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BURROWS. I would rather wait just a moment until I close on this point. If you will provide in that rule (Rule XI, clause 51) that a proposition coming from any committee of the House of Representatives asking consideration of a measure, when referred to the Committee on Rules, shall be reported back within ten days, then you will give the majority of this House or its committees an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BYNUM. Did you have that in your rules in the last Congress?

Mr. BURROWS. No, sir. We had a good many good things in those rules, but we could not adopt every needed reform at once.

Mr. BYNUM. And a good many things were disapproved of by the people.

Mr. BURROWS. If the Committee on Rules desire to have any particular measure considered they bring in their report, and no dilatory motion can be allowed against that report; and when a day is fixed for the consideration of a measure they favor, then that measure can be passed by a majority vote; but when any member of the House or any committee of this House desires to suspend the rules, it must have a two-thirds vote in order to be successful.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman state to the House how it would be if, for example, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures should ask for a day to consider any legislation before that committee, and the Committee on Rules should report adversely upon the request.

Mr. BURROWS. But they would never report. If it was provided that the Committee on Rules should report within a given time, and if these rules were to be amended so that the Committee on Rules must report upon a proposition submitted to them, then the House would have the opportunity to pass upon such matters; but the committee are very careful not to impose upon themselves any such duty.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. Would not the whole trouble be obviated, with reference to the report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, if that committee should, by an amendment to Rule XI, paragraph 51, be made a privileged committee, with authority to report at any time?

Mr. BURROWS. Not at all. The authority to report at any time would not do away with the filibustering.

Mr. LANHAM. It might not prevent dilatory motions, but at the same time it would make that committee a privileged committee.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in conclusion upon this branch, that if this system of rules be adopted, with the power given to the Committee on Rules as suggested by this code of rules, and with no other power to suspend than that which is mentioned, on certain Mondays of each month, no business can be transacted in this House except by unanimous consent and by suspension, as I have indicated.

Mr. CATCHINGS. May I ask my friend one question before he passes that subject?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan if there was any provision in the rules which governed the Fifty-first Congress by which any gentleman having charge of a bill could bring it up for consideration, or even take the sense of the House as to whether it should be considered or not?

Mr. BURROWS. No, sir; except on suspension day.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Precisely, and we make no change in that regard, so your rules were exactly like ours in that particular.

Mr. BURROWS. If I understand your question—will you repeat your question again?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I want to know if there was any provision in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress by which any gentleman having charge of a given measure and desiring to have it considered by the House could by force of his own, as an individual Representative here present, obtain consideration of it, or even take the sense of the House upon the question as to whether it should be considered?

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, he could not take it out of its order, but the opportunities for reaching it were much greater under the rules of the Fifty-first Congress than under these rules; and then the moment it was reached and he had the floor and it was under consideration a minority was powerless to filibuster against it. The question could be brought to a vote.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can recall a single measure that was taken up in the last Congress unless it was in pursuance of the Speaker's consent previously obtained or the consent of the Committee on Rules previously obtained, unless it was some little private measure on a private-bill day?

Mr. BURROWS. There were numerous ways under the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, which I will proceed to point out, by which bills could be reached, considered, and passed without special orders or motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That does not answer my question.

Mr. BURROWS. If my friend will allow me to go on, for I am taking too much time and I want to close what I have to say——

Mr. REED. There were a lot of Senate bills, for one thing.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to call attention now, Mr. Speaker, to other methods which the majority of the Committee on Rules have deliberately put into these rules for the purpose of accomplishing delay. Under these rules, when any bill comes up for consideration which involves the expenditure of money, the House must resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of that bill. Now, when you get into committee under these rules you take up the bills in their order on the Calendar, and any single member of this House, when the first bill is called and the majority of the committee want to pass over that bill to take up the next or the one following, any one member can interpose an objection and say, "I object to passing over the first bill on the Calendar."

The first bill on the Calendar may be one that the committee does not want to consider at all. They want to lay it aside and go to the consideration of another measure in which the committee is interested, and under the rules one member may stop laying aside the first bill, and the moment an objection is made the committee must rise, go back into the House (a senseless performance), and take the judgment of the House whether the first bill shall be laid aside or not upon the objection of a single member, thus giving an opportunity for the yeas and nays, a motion for delay, for filibustering, to adjourn, or take a recess, and to arrest all legislative work of that day.

Now, what did the rules of the Fifty-first Congress provide? The rules of that Congress simply provided, when the House was in committee and objection was made to passing over the first or any other bill, the committee itself determined by a majority vote whether it should proceed to the consideration of that measure or not; and in that way we were able to do business in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that in Committee of the Whole there is no opportunity to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROWS. And, as suggested by my friend from Illinois, in the Committee of the Whole the yeas and nays can not be taken on a motion to take a recess or to adjourn or on any other motion. In Committee of the Whole and by the rule of the Fifty-first Congress we were able to do business; but under these rules one single member can force a dissolution of that committee, take it back to the House, inaugurate filibustering motions, and arrest legislation. Why do you reinstate that provision of the rules unless it be the deliberate purpose of the majority to say that no business shall be done by this House except as your leaders may dictate?

Another proposition for delay: These rules provide that the Speaker every day shall lay before the House messages and documents—executive messages and messages from the Senate—for proper reference. If a bill has passed the House and gone to the Senate and comes back to the Speaker's table with an amendment simply in the name of the person mentioned in the bill, if a private bill, or any immaterial amendment, under these rules it must go from the Speaker's table to the committee of the House having jurisdiction of that subject, and after the committee has considered it, reported back to the House, and go to the Calendar, and possibly near the foot, to be buried forever.

Now, the rules of the Fifty-first Congress provided that when a Senate bill, or a House bill amended by the Senate, came back to the House and was on the Speaker's table, if it did not carry an appropriation, it was in order for the Speaker to lay that bill before the House for immediate consideration, so that the error of the House, or the amendment proposed by the Senate, could be agreed to at that time and the legislation perfected; yet under these rules if a mistake is made of the most trifling character it must go to a committee, be considered, and if reported back take its place on the Calendar.

But it was also provided in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress that an original bill coming from the Senate, if a House bill like it in substance had been acted upon by a House committee, and had been reported by such committee and placed on the Calendar, when the Senate bill came over and was on the Speaker's table, a gentleman could rise in his place and ask that the bill of the Senate, which was similar to one reported by a committee of the House, should be at once taken up and considered. Under these rules that can not be done. Another opportunity for delay. That Senate bill, although you have a bill precisely like it reported from a House committee, which has examined the subject, is referred to the committee, and when the committee reports it back favorably, as it did the House bill, the Senate bill takes its place, only further down, on the Calendar, where it will not be reached. Why is that done, except to obstruct and delay business by the use of every means known to parliamentary law? And what next?

We provided that a quorum of the Committee of the Whole House should consist of 100. You cut that out, and say that it shall consist of 167; and every member in this House knows by experience that it is utterly impossible, as a rule, to keep 167 members here in Committee of the Whole. The result is, the moment we are without a quorum all business is suspended. I should be glad to hear why that rule is changed so as to make a quorum of 167 instead of 100. Then, besides having all these obstructions, sending everything to the Calendar, you wipe out the session set apart Friday evenings for the consideration of pension legislation, and send all these bills to the Private Calendar, to be heard one day in the week, with all the war claims and all the other claims with which that Calender is loaded.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the gentleman know that from the beginning of the war and through the war period, when the Republicans were in control of the House, down to the last Congress, that was not embraced in the rules, but was a matter of special order?

Mr. BURROWS. Does not my friend know that we embodied it in the rules of the last House?

Mr. McMILLIN. I know you did in the last Congress, but never before.

Mr. BURROWS. Well, we desire it should be retained.

Mr. McMILLIN. But if it is wrong to leave it out of the rules, why had you not put it into them previously during your long control here?

Mr. BURROWS. Because the necessity did not exist previously to such extent as in recent years.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not my friend know——

Mr. BURROWS. I can not yield further. My time is being consumed. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed fifty-three minutes. He is not limited except in so far as the House has limited his side to three hours.

Mr. BURROWS. A few words more and I shall be through. I would be glad to discuss that other rule which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has had ingrafted upon this report, but I will say only a word about it. I refer to the rule which proposes legislation on appropriation bills, a provision that never saw the light of day until the Forty-fourth Congress, and under the operation of which the Army bill failed in the second session of that Congress, so that a special session of Congress, with all its burdens, had to be called in consequence of the House attempting under that rule to legislate touching the Army.

Gentlemen will remember that in the Forty-fifth Congress both the Army bill and the great legislative bill failed because legislation was attempted upon those bills under this rule, legislation offensive to the country, and that a special session was called to pass both of those measures and provide for the support of the Government. And gentlemen will remember also that the threat was made that under that rule the Government should be starved if the minority did not consent to certain legislation on appropriation bills, and that the appropriation bills which ought to be confined to appropriating money under the law were used as a leverage to force legislation upon the statute books of the United States.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman state who it was that made the charge that we were going to starve the Government?

Mr. BURROWS. A gentleman who is not now in this House.

Mr. MILLS. A gentleman then in this House, Mr. Garfield, charged upon us that we were proposing to do that. He said to us: "You are trying to starve the Government." But nobody on our side ever said such a thing.

Mr. BURROWS. I think my friend will remember that a gentleman, then a member of the House, and now a distinguished Senator representing the State of Kentucky, when this question was under discussion, boldly declared that they did not intend to cease warfare by the instrumentality of this rule until every particle of the war legislation of the Republican party was wiped from the statute book.

Mr. MILLS. That is not the question.

Mr. BURROWS. That is what he said.

Mr. MILLS. But you have gone off from the question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The record does not bear out the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. I think the gentleman is in error, but that is neither here nor there. This provision was continued until the Forty-ninth Congress, and in the Forty-ninth Congress, a Democratic Congress, it was dropped. In the Forty-ninth Congress a Democratic House eliminated this rule, and Mr. Morrison reported a code of rules leaving out that provision.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposed to put on the proposition in the House, and it was defeated by a vote of 205 nays against 69 in the affirmative. On that occasion such gentlemen as Mr. BLANCHARD, and Mr. BLAND, and Mr. BLOUNT, and both the BRECKINRIDGES, and Mr. BYNUM, and Mr. CATCHINGS, and Mr. CRAIN, and Mr. DOCKERY, and Mr. HEARD, and Mr. HERBERT, and Mr. MILLS, the distinguished gentleman from Texas, and Mr. O'FERRALL, and Mr. OUTHWAITE, and Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. STEWART, and Mr. STONE, and Mr. WHITING, my colleague from Michigan, and Mr. WISE, all voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, and, as I have said, there were only 69 votes for it and 205 votes against it.

It was left out in the Forty-ninth Congress, it was left out in the Fiftieth Congress and in the Fifty-first, but now it is proposed to put it into the rules again. I suppose it is to be done in obedience to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. SPRINGER], who in a speech the other night said:

> The question which most concerns the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, and the solution of which is especially imposed upon the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, is: "What can be done during this session which will improve our chances of success?"

[Laughter.]

So, in obedience to that declaration, it is proposed by the Committee on Rules and the majority to tie the majority hand and foot, so that it can not legislate. By this method, by the adoption of this code of rules, you propose, gentlemen, to escape responsibility. When questioned as to why this or that measure was not passed you will answer, "We could not do it under the rules. The rules prohibited it." The whole purpose of these rules is to protect yourselves from yourselves. Having relegated to the rear the statesmen of your party, who have fought your battles and won your victories, you propose now to abandon the field of your triumphs, and, adopting the policy of masterly inactivity, take refuge behind the impenetrable barriers of parliamentary obstruction, hoping to shield yourselves from the responsibilities of legislation and escape the storm of public indignation. Let me predict that you will do neither. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to be exceedingly difficult to get our friends on the other side of the House to understand what we on this side mean when we say that a majority should rule. The speech of mine which has been quoted to-day—a speech made in 1879—has been referred to frequently on the other side of the House, and it lays down, I think, a fundamental principle upon which the whole of our American political system is based. The power of a majority within the limits prescribed to it by the fundamental law is supreme. The power of a majority beyond the limits prescribed to it by our system of free government, instituted and created by written constitutions, becomes the power of a lawless mob. There is where we stand.

Majorities are supreme within the limitations of the power granted to them—within the limitations fixed by the people of the United States when they ordained and established our free system of government. Our fathers who framed that Government admonished us, their children, that power must be watched and jealously watched at all times; that limits must be thrown around it to prevent it from encroaching upon the natural and inalienable rights of the people. Upon any matter submitted to a legislative assembly or to the people within the distribution of powers as defined by our written Constitution a majority of the people is supreme.

But my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and those who are associated with him believe that a majority can do anything, whether it is right or wrong; that the majority must determine for itself whether the thing proposed is right, and if decided to be right, that they have authority to do it. But our fathers did not so understand the sanctity of majority rule when they wrote down in the Federal Constitution and in every State constitution safeguards against the conduct of majorities. Will the gentleman pretend to say that a majority of all the people of the United States can deny to a citizen the right of trial by jury when he is called upon to answer a criminal accusation? I say that, so long as our Constitution is the supreme law of the land, one man can defy the whole sixty millions of our people when they undertake to do anything outside of that instrument, and can call upon the Government to stand by him. Can a majority of the people of the United States go into a State and invade its rights, confiscating the property or sacrificing the lives of its citizens? The Government of the United States is powerful; but the Constitution forbids it to enter that domain.

The gentleman tells us that we on this side consumed eight or ten valuable days in resisting in this House a certain measure that the majority wanted to pass. Yes, Mr. Speaker, he and I were here long years ago in the Forty-third Congress, when he on his side of the House and those who were following him wanted to pass a public law (and they did it) invading the rights of the States. We resisted it in this Hall for seventy-two hours continuously. We denounced it as an infraction of the constitutional rights of the States and of the people. Gentlemen on the other side of the House passed that measure; but the Supreme Court declared that our arguments against it were right, and that it was a nullity. Yet you think we had no right to filibuster in order to defeat an unconstitutional invasion of the rights of the States.

You say that we tried to place upon an appropriation bill a "rider" which deprived you of the power of putting soldiers around the ballot boxes of the country, and converting this from a free Government, founded upon the unrestrained consent of the people, to a military despotism. Yes, we fought that battle too, believing that you were exceeding the rightful bounds of the power of the majority, and we will fight every measure of that sort which you may bring before us; we will go back and appeal to the people of the United States at the ballot box, as we have done hitherto, to settle whether this Government shall be maintained and transmitted to our children as our sires framed it, or whether you shall be permitted to convert it into a military despotism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes, Mr. Speaker, we bow to the will of a majority constitutionally expressed——

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me a moment?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I simply want to remind the gentleman that the action taken for the purpose of "escaping from military despotism" was on the part of a majority of this House, not the minority, and that the "riders" were put on by the majority, not by a minority.

Mr. MILLS. But you had had a majority, and you were then playing the part of filibusters to maintain military despotism, which we were trying to throw off.

Mr. REED. Not at all; our effort was against putting "riders" on appropriation bills.

Mr. MILLS. The arguments of our friends on the other side are very convenient for them. We have an old-fashioned way of sticking to the truth whether in prosperity or adversity. But they filibuster whenever it is profitable to them; and whenever it is not profitable to them they raise their hands in holy horror and talk about "the rights of majorities." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, this Government could not have existed for a hundred years and come down to us with all its blessings had it not been that the Constitution in so many of it provisions has fettered majorities—has recognized and warned the people of the dangerous lust of power that is characteristic of majorities. Sixty million people can not prevent the exporting of a bale of cotton if one man in one of the cotton States wants to export it. Sixty million people can not prescribe to you any form of religious worship or disturb any man in the free exercise of his pious convictions. Why? Because the Constitution has declared that no majority shall have any right to interfere with any man's religion. Sixty million people can not prevent a man from speaking his convictions—from publishing and printing them. The Government, with all the power of majorities behind it, can not invade this right so long as those controlling the Government recognize the integrity and justice and supremacy of our Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. Twenty minutes, or so much as desired.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, most of the rules that have been reported to the House are commonplace regulations of parliamentary procedure, over which and about which there will not be much partisan controversy or comment. There are, however, two provisions that are important, far-reaching, and in view of the attitude of the Democratic party in the last Congress, significant of the shams of politics. One of these provisions declares:

It shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules, and pending the consideration the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said report shall have been fully disposed of.

It requires very little thought to discover how pervasive and rigorous this provision is, if the majority desire to take advantage of it; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has just declared to us that political majorities as well as legislative majorities can seek wrong and do wrong. Quoting Democratic language, I can say this provision manacles and throttles and gags the minority as fully and as completely as though restraints of it were stamped on every line of the rules.

Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-first Congress it was declared as a rule of this House that no dilatory motion should be entertained by the Speaker. On its suggestion and enactment a shriek of passionate protest went up from every Democratic throat. It was said, ay, it was shouted, that the precedents of a hundred years were shocked by it; that our legislative liberties were menaced as though gunpowder had been placed under the Capitol. The spasm is over; we are calmer now. A different set of fellows is on top. [Laughter.] A Republican Speaker could not be trusted; it seems that a Democratic Speaker can be trusted, and "without glass eyes, which might make him, like a scurvy politician, see the things he does not, to search the motives of members and distinguish what is and what is not a dilatory motion" without puncturing the Constitution or upsetting the liberties of the people. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MCKENNA. Not now. I prefer to conclude what I wish to say first.

Mr. BYNUM. I only desired to call attention to the fact that there is nothing in the rules that authorizes the Speaker now to declare what are dilatory motions.

Mr. MCKENNA. No, not more than in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. BYNUM. But I want to call your attention to the fact that you are not stating it accurately.

Mr. MCKENNA. This is real advancement and solid comfort too. We are glad, we Republicans, because our patriotism and our vanity have been vindicated and solaced. The "usurpers" and "tyrants" of the Fifty-first Congress have become patriotic examples to the Fifty-second Congress, and all by Democratic imitation. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I must marvel somewhat. Must dilatory tactics go, and by a Democratic decree, when the majority desires it? Must these holy things, sanctified by a hundred years of actual or of potential use, be forever driven from the House, if the majority so desires? It was proclaimed to us that the right to make dilatory motions was the sacredest right of Congressmen, emancipating us from obligations to the House and connecting us alone in responsibility to our constituents, who, in moments of exaltation we are pleased to call the "pure fountain of our power." And did not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] declare that the surest guaranty of good legislation was a "vigilant minority?" He meant, of course, an unfettered minority, unfettered against a political majority as well as against a legislative majority. And did he not with entertaining and instructive history tell us how filibustering had become an instrument in the hands of patriotic men to defeat corruption and check extravagances? How Mr. Washburne of Illinois had attempted to defeat the reduction of the Government mortgage on Pacific railroads to a second place; and how Mr. Randall had defeated the force bill and the subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Line? How it had been used by Mr. Douglas, and how Mr. Fessenden had also prevented by it the degradation of a President, and did he not point out to us Mr. Anderson of Kansas in active virtue filibustering against the refunding the debt of the Pacific railroads?

Where, Oh where, is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] now? Has he, as he intimated the gentleman from Kansas had—has he "folded his tent, like the Arab, and silently stolen away?" I think I know where he is. I was once a filibustering patriot myself, and I know how virtuous men feel when they are in the minority. I know how virtuously they do not always act when they are in the majority. But, Mr. Speaker, such virtues can not be peddled around on all occasions, and as for me, since the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the Democratic party are running away from virtue, I have a temptation to return to it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the Democratic party can always be relied on to make a mistake at the proper time. I inflict this chestnut on the weary world, because always a mistake of the Democratic party is the latest thing out. It seems that it can not even do right without making a mistake or accusing itself. It is always in need of new departures. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] is afraid it is going to make a flop on the silver question. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is sure it will do it in the national convention. Some other gentlemen are afraid it will flop on tariff reform. We know now, from the exhibition to-day, that it has flopped on the rights of minorities.

But it is an astonishing and curious fatuity that, after its clatter, its fuss, and fury in the last Congress, it should resolve and provide for the majority of the House to control and to enforce its will by rigid rules of procedure; the very thing it declaimed against as fatal to deliberation, fatal to legislative liberty, and destructive of the right of minorities. Does it not do that very thing, Mr. Speaker? The rule provides that the report of the Committee on Rules may be called up for consideration at any time. What is the Committee on Rules. It is the instrument of the will of a majority of this House. It can be the instrument of the despotism of the majority of this House. It is all-privileged, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has told you. Its report, once called up, can not be defeated. It can only be delayed by one motion to adjourn.

Oh, gentlemen, you allow plenty of liberities in other directions; but you bind fast there. When I think of it, I am inclined to think we were blunderers to you. You are artists in the artful, and you do things with such a refinement and finesse that it makes us marvel, although we know it is characteristic. In five lines you assert and grasp an absolute power, a power all-pervasive and inexorable. Where, in your sacred storehouse of venerable and hoary precedents, do you find an example for it? And you do not stop there. You may want to speed things with extra hurry through the House.

Suspension day, the willingness of the Speaker, and your large majority furnish you opportunity and means. What is suspension day? It is also bill day. You have a bill day. That is one of the showy things with which you bedeck your actions, with which you amuse members, especially new members, by giving them, once a month or so, the Speaker's eye, and flatter them by enabling them to introduce bills in the sight of an admiring constituency. That is immense. But we know, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] said, and we have seen the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Anderson] often consume a whole day by demanding the reading of bills. You prevent this by providing that no more than one hour shall be consumed on suspension days by the introduction of bills. I repeat, when I think of it, we were blunderers to you; you do things so smoothly—with such a pious and patriotic air.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I have no objection to these rules, inasmuch as they execute the will of the majority. It may be the legislative right of a majority to have its way. It may be the legislative duty of the majority; but I do object to the condemnation of the Republican party for what you now propose yourselves. That is, bind and control the minority. You do it effectually, though you do it cunningly. It is the most cunning masquerade I think I have ever seen; but I do not know that I ought to object to it on that ground, because I believe that the Democratic party appears best in masquerade; that when it puts its native semblance off and any other semblance on it appears to better advantage.

Sir, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has detailed carefully and eloquently the effect of the rules. When a partisan or political majority has no interest, he has shown you how feeble the individual is. I do not know that that can be prevented. I have thought very seriously about it, because every member who has been in the House for any length of time knows, and every new member will soon find out, that he is met everywhere by the obstruction of the institution and sometimes bullied by the institution. This may not be accidental; it may be inevitable. I am not fatalist enough to say that "whatever is is right," or with the Turk to say further, "Allah be praised," nor am I disposed to say this House be praised or the other thing. [Laughter.] I wish for greater freedom to the individual. It may not be possible to secure it. It is worth the trial, and I will take occasion, when the rules are considered under the five-minute debate, to suggest amendments and try to extend some of the utility and beneficence attempted to be absorbed by the Committee on Rules. [Applause on the Republican side).

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAPHAM. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless the motion to adjourn shall be withdrawn the Chair can not entertain any other motion.

The question was put, the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1933) to amend section 860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. Before the bill is referred I desire to say that the purpose of the bill—and I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to it—is to amend section 860 of the Revised Statutes, which I wish to have done because of a recent decision of the Supreme Court in what is known as the Counselman case, under the interstate-commerce act. That case went off the docket, or it was decided against the right to require a witness to testify, not on account of anything that was in the interstate-commerce law, but because, as the court stated, section 860 of the Revised Statutes, which has been on the statue books now for twenty or thirty years, is not as broad in its scope as the Constitution, giving immunity or security to the rights of a witness under the Constitution.

I ask the special attention of the committee to that provision, as it applies not only to prosecutions for violations of law under the interstate-commerce act, but in all criminal prosecutions under the laws of the United States; but as it has been especially decided in a case under the interstate-commerce law, it affects prosecutions under that law in the future. As it is a general provision that I think ought to be considered by the Judiciary Committee, I introduce the bill and move that it be referred to that committee instead of to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I am chairman.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. I ask whether the decision that this witness was not bound to testify was made upon any clause of the interstate-commerce law or upon another and a different statute.

Mr. CULLOM. I have stated that the decision went off upon a construction of section 860 of the Revised Statutes, which has been upon the books now, I think, since 1868. It is not under any provision of the interstate-commerce act at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. So that the idea that has prevailed, that it was only found in the interstate-commerce law, is an incorrect one.

Mr. CULLOM. It is entirely incorrect if any such idea as that has prevailed.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 35) providing for the purchase of historical manuscripts relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CARLISLE. I offer a resolution and ask that it may lie over; I shall call it up at some future time.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate at the earliest date practicable all deficiencies of not less than 10 per cent in amount in the paid salaries of third, fourth, and fifth class postmasters, in claims presented to the Postmaster-General within the time limited by the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 487), from the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Kansas, Kentucky, and Illinois. Such report to state, from existing entries on Department form 1224 A, as to each and every such deficiency within each and every biennial term between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, in regular order, the name of the post-office, the name of the postmaster, the biennial or fractional biennial term within which the deficiency exists, the amount of the postmaster's salary ascertained by the act of June 22, 1854 (10 Stat., 298), upon the quarterly returns within the biennial term specified, the amount of the office salary received by such postmaster for the specified biennial or fractional biennial term, and the amount of the deficiency between the salary received and the salary thus ascertained within such biennial or fractional biennial term specified. The total amount of such deficiencies of salaries of postmasters in each of said States to be also stated, and a copy of Department letter, form 1223, published by the Postmaster-General in 1884 and the years following, declaratory of the title of such postmasters to payment of the deficiencies in salaries herein described by virtue of section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866 (14 Stat., 59), and the said act of March 3, 1883.

PURCHASE OF MADISON COLLECTION.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate whether it is advisable for the Government to purchase a certain collection of autographs and historical papers now in the possession of the executors of James C. McGuire, formerly of Washington City, D. C., and known as the Madison collection.

AFFAIRS IN ALASKA.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and instructed to institute and conduct an investigation and inquiry into the resources of the district of Alaska; the character, occupations, and social condition of its inhabitants, white, Indian, and of mixed blood; its form and system of government; whether the same is adapted to the present and prospective development of the district; its laws, and whether they are enforced or allowed to be violated; what other or further legislation is necessary for the better government and needs of the said district and for the protection and well-being of its people; and any and all matters relating to the civil administration and future welfare of the people of Alaska.

Such committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer; and shall make report with recommendations as to future legislation.

The necessary expenses consequent upon such inquiry and investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate when certified by the chairman of the committee and audited and allowed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE WITH CHINA.

Mr. HOAR. If no other resolutions are to be introduced this morning, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 25th of January in regard to the seat held by Mr. CHILTON from the State of Texas.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a resolution that I desire to offer, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is directed to send to the Senate copies of the correspondence had with the Chinese Government relating to the non-acceptance of Hon. Henry W. Blair as minister of the United States to China.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the same.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama if it is usual to direct the Secretary of State absolutely to communicate correspondence with foreign governments. It seems to me the resolution should go to the President, and he should communicate the information, if not, in his judgment, incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. MORGAN. We have sent a great many such resolutions to the Secretary of State. The rule is that the correspondence of the State Department with any foreign government upon any subject is considered secret until that Department chooses to publish it or until Congress calls for it. There is no question here as to whether it is proper, in consideration of the public interests, that this information should come to the Senate, for the transaction is completed; it has passed some time ago.

My object in seeking the information is merely to find out what the action of our Government was when objection was interposed by China to the admission or acceptance of Mr. Blair as minister to that country. Mr. Blair did not go to that country. I am informed he did not go because China objected to his going. He was therefore not persona grata to the Chinese Government; and I want to know the reasons that Government asserted against him, and what action our Government took upon that suggestion on the part of the Chinese Government.

So far as Mr. Blair is concerned I think I am at liberty to say here that he was confirmed instantly upon his name being presented to the Senate by the unanimous vote of this body very cordially given, and so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned there could not have been a stronger affirmation of his fitness to represent this Government in China or anywhere else than we gave. So I think the Senate must have been greatly surprised to find that the foreign government interposed an objection. The matter lingered along for some time, and Mr. Blair, feeling that it was due to his own personal dignity, resigned the position, but not until China had declined peremptorily or positively to accept him.

Now, it becomes a matter of important inquiry, in view of questions that are presented for public consideration, as to what is the established line of procedure on the part of the Government of the United States when it is notified that a gentleman of such high reputation amongst us has been commissioned to China and that he has been rejected by that Government. I merely desire to get at the precedent and the practice of our Government upon that subject, which without the assistance of this resolution I can not get.

There is certainly no matter connected with the diplomatic service of the country or with any current question or any future question between ourselves and China that would make it necessary for us to appeal to the President and say to him that unless the public good otherwise requires he should send in the correspondence; but it has been the uniform practice of the Senate, as I think the Senator must remember, to call upon the Department of State for any information that appears in the records of that Department on any completed transaction.

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield to the Senator from Alabama or to any other Senator in the matter of kindliest feeling towards the late Senator from New Hampshire. I suppose what the Senator says may very likely be true, that the transaction to which he alludes is a completed one; but still it seems very clear to my mind that the uniform method of obtaining such information would be by request to the President to communicate it if in his judgment it be not inconsistent with the public interest.

The Senator thinks that the resolution merely calls for a correspondence completed. There may be, for aught we know, something in the correspondence affecting this question which our Government might desire to give an opportunity to China to withdraw or to reconsider before it shall be made public. Perhaps the attitude of China may yet be changed, and a publication of what has been already said by her representative would interfere with that possibility.

So it seems to me that always, where a matter not of domestic but of foreign concern has been the subject of a correspondence with a foreign government the Senate should pursue the course of making the request to the President. It would come undoubtedly to the same thing, if the Senator be right, as I presume he is, and I suggest to him to modify his resolution in that respect. Otherwise I shall be compelled to object to it and ask to have it go over.

Mr. MORGAN. I would very cheerfully accept the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts but for the fact that it reverses in my recollection the entire action of the Senate. I dislike to oppose myself to such eminent authority upon a matter of this kind, but I am very clear in the statement that we are commonly in the habit in respect of closed transactions, of past transactions not now the subject of diplomatic intercourse, to call upon the Secretary of State and to direct him to send in the papers. I think that is the uniform practice as to closed transactions. I remember that when the great fisheries controversy was before the Senate we did not hesitate to demand of the Secretary of State the sending in of papers relating to that transaction, although the correspondence about it was then very recently closed.

I would modify the resolution merely to gratify the Senator from Massachusetts, but I do not think the objection is tenable. I would rather that it should go over and give me an opportunity to satisfy the Senator by a great many examples, some of which I dare say he is the author of himself, that we have acted uniformly upon the line of proceeding suggested in the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and then, if that committee find that it is in accordance with precedents, of which committee the Senator from Alabama is a member, they can report it back to the Senate, and it can be passed.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a question to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a question as to how the Senate shall get the information by a formal resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I enter that motion, and shall insist on it.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not any doubt that the Committee on Foreign Relations would be just as anxious as I am to know what the precedent is in regard to the Chinese matter. It is something that we have to consider, and I offer the resolution really for the advantage of the committee, to put it in possession of the diplomatic correspondence upon that very delicate subject, which has become again a subject of delicate attention on the part of two Governments that are now somewhat embroiled.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TELLER. It does not seem to me that there need be a great deal of difficulty about this matter. The subject has been thoroughly ventilated in the public press. Perhaps the public have not seen the exact correspondence and do not understand precisely the phraseology in which the objection of the Chinese Government was couched; but that the objection was made everybody understands just as well as it will be understood when we have received the papers, and therefore it does not seem to me that it is a matter which the State Department or the President can object to. It is a matter that we are entitled to receive, as I understand.

I understand that the Government of China had a right to make the objection which it did make. It is not an insult to us; it is no infringement of the courtesies which exist between nations when one objects to an ambassador or a minister who is sent to it any more than it is when it asks for the withdrawal of an objectionable minister. It is not a matter of friction between governments when these things occur, because every government is entitled to have the representative from a foreign government personally unobjectionable to itself. We ourselves have insisted upon that, and we have no right to complain that China insisted upon it, whether it was properly insisted upon or not.

I can see no reason why there should be any delay in calling for these papers if anybody thinks we ought to have them. I think perhaps we ought. I see no reason why the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate is not entitled to this information, or why we should decline to call for it if the Committee on Foreign Relations should so state.

I believe that the resolution is strictly in accordance with the precedents which have prevailed in the Senate for many years.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to speak of this correspondence as having been finished. I am not myself aware that it has been concluded. The Senator may know more about that subject than I do. We know nothing about it except——

Mr. MORGAN. I do not profess to know anything about it except what the papers say. I know Mr. Blair told me that he had sent in his resignation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, there is no doubt that Senator Blair, finding that there was delay and also objection, tendered his resignation to the President. Whether it has been accepted or not I do not know, although I think it has been; but that the correspondence is completed I do not think the Senator from Alabama has the right to assume. If we are to get our information from the newspapers, as it seems we do gather all that we have on this subject, it may be remarked that within a week a statement has appeared that the Chinese Government had withdrawn their objection to Senator Blair as minister.

Now, although Senator Blair may very properly have tendered his resignation, and although it may have been accepted, the correspondence upon a matter of some delicacy may still be going on, and therefore I think that a peremptory order upon the State Department would be injudicious.

I will take occasion to say further that in view of this remark I do not think that anything would be disclosed which would redound otherwise than with credit to the honor of my late colleague. Whatever words he may have used in expressing his views on the question of the admission of subjects of China to this country, I do not understand that he entertains any views which are not entertained by nineteen-twentieths of the American people and are not entertained by all persons from whom the President would be likely to select a minister to China.

Then so far as I am concerned I shall be glad to see the correspondence, but I am not aware that it has been completed and that it is such a past and finished transaction of the State Department that the Senate ought to exercise its privilege of directing, instead of requesting, the publication. I therefore certainly hope that the Senator from Alabama will either allow the resolution to go to the committee, or will modify the language, in which case I shall have no objection to its immediate passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the question of the propriety of the form of the pending resolution depends entirely upon the fact whether or not the transaction referred to is a completed one or is still an open one. As a matter of course, if this was a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State for the ordinary information in his Department in respect to a treaty which had been ratified by the Senate and was in process of execution, it would be perfectly proper to call on the Secretary of State or any other officer of the Government for the information. The usual courtesy that has applied to the President does not apply to the heads of Departments.

But the trouble, I think, is that this is not a completed transaction by any means. The fact that we have the nomination of no minister to China before us, the fact that the appointment to this place has not been filled since the nomination of Senator Blair——

Mr. TELLER. We have a minister there now.

Mr. SHERMAN. We may have a minister there; but this transaction involves the replacing of a minister and appointing a new minister; and we know that no nomination has been made by the President.

Mr. MORGAN. We have a minister to China. We have not recalled the other minister.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but the question now pending is not whether we have a minister or not, but whether the process of appointing a minister has yet been completed, and we know it has not been completed; and we know, although there has been long delay in the case upon the subject-matter, yet no new minister has been appointed, and even the resignation of the minister appointed has not been accepted, so far as we know. Then the thing is still open, and I presume we must infer that the correspondence is still going on between the President of the United States, through the Secretary of State, and the Government of China, probably upon this very subject-matter.

Now, is it wise for us to call for a partial correspondence which is still going on upon a subject of some delicacy, especially with a nation like the Chinese, who are very sensitive upon any diplomatic question? I think, therefore, with all due deference to my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Relations, whose opinion I respect in all matters, that he had better either let the resolution go over for a while or let it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations where he will probably ascertain for himself the precise status of the question; I think then the resolution had better go over under objection or upon the motion made to refer it.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to say a word before final action is taken upon the question. On suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that there is possibly some unfinished matter connected with this imbroglio or whatever it is between the United States and China, I am entirely willing to modify my resolution so as to let it read:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public service, etc.

Then the President can determine for himself two questions; first, whether it is incompatible with the public service to let a precedent so recently established by this Administration come into the view of the country at this moment of time, which I think is a very important reason; and he can further determine another question, which I confess has been one of very considerable debate in my own mind, about which I have had some feeling as an American Senator, and that is whether or not that feature of the Constitution of the United States which holds that a Senator shall not be accountable in any other place for utterances made in the Senate of the United States shall be permitted by the Government of the United States to be raised as a question and tried and determined by any foreign country to whom we accredit a minister.

My judgment is that when a foreign government, with a knowledge of our liberty of speech in this body, decides not to accept a minister whom we send because of utterances on this floor, that government asks us to participate with it in a conscious violation of the privileges and rights of public representatives, and I would break off relations with a government that would treat a Senator in that way.

It may be that the President of the United States has that subject in contemplation. I hope he has, and for the dignity and honor of this country it will not hereafter be asserted by any government in this world that a person is nonacceptable to a foreign government and is to be held accountable in a foreign court for utterances in the Senate of the United States. The freedom of debate, the freedom of statement upon questions concerning the welfare of the people of the United States is among the things that every custom and feature of this Government ought to preserve, whether in the diplomatic or the naval or the military or the judicial service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TELLER. In what I before said I proceeded upon the assumption that this was a closed matter. A newspaper stated to us a long time since that the nominee had sent in his resignation and that it had been accepted. We are still represented in China by the minister who was appointed by the Administration preceding the present one, the minister who was to have been superseded by Mr. Blair if it had not been objected to by the Chinese Government. If it is an open question I shall not be in favor of asking the Department to send us the correspondence. If the Senator offering the resolution says it is an open question I should be governed by that of course, because the Department is entitled to close the matter, and we might greatly embarrass the Department by calling for information of that kind before the matter was closed. It seems to me, however, that there can be no question that it ought to be closed.

I do not agree with the Senator from Alabama that the constitutional provision that a Senator shall not be called in question for words uttered in debate is of such great force and of such wide extent that it reaches over to China, so that the Chinese can not object to words spoken here as well as words spoken on the rostrum or anywhere else in the country.

I understand it is one of the recognized rules of international law which have grown up from time immemorial that a minister must be acceptable to the country to which he is sent, and that if he is objectionable at any time they can ask for his recall, and that it is not a matter that the nation which is thus asked to recall its minister should find fault about. The nation to which he is sent are to be the judges and the matter is in their discretion. Therefore it is not a matter of offense, as I before stated. We have ourselves on more than one occasion taken advantage of this provision of international law, and we would not be willing that any other rule should exist.

Practically, Mr. President, there would be no use in sending a minister to China that China objected to, nor to any other country.

I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that there was nothing in the character or in the words spoken by the Senator who was nominated for that position that would justify his rejection. He was in accord, I have no doubt, with 99 per cent of the people of the United States upon that subject. His words were couched in reasonable and appropriate language, and there could have been no real objection to him. But if it is a matter discretionary with the government to whom he is accredited to say whether he is objectionable or not, we can not discuss that question with them. When they say they do not want a minister, it is our business to say we do not send him. When they say if we have sent him they want him recalled, it is our business to recall him unless there are peculiar circumstances, such as might have existed in the case of Chile recently or some other country where we might decline to recall him, but the ordinary rule which exists between nations of the highest intelligence and the highest culture is that when a minister is objected to he is not sent and when he is sent and is subsequently objected to he is recalled.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion and I will withdraw my motion on the intimation of the Senator from Alabama that under the peculiar circumstances of the case he proposes to modify his resolution. I think, however, I ought to express my dissent from the doctrine of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the extent to which he has affirmed it.

Where a foreign nation objects to the continuance in our diplomatic service at its court of a minister, or objects to receiving a minister for any peculiar special act of his or special utterance of his in which he is distinguished from the ordinary——

Mr. TELLER. Or his general character.

Mr. HOAR. Or for anything in his personal character that may be in dispute or in debate, unquestionably that nation is to be the judge and we must comply with their inclination and abstain from sending an envoy, or refrain from continuing an envoy, in our service when they intimate he is not an agreeable person to them. But if a foreign government puts its refusal to receive a citizen of the United States on the fact of his holding opinions which substantially every citizen of the United States holds, or if it puts its objection to the continuance in office of a minister at its court solely on the ground that our minister has done his duty faithfully to his own Government, I am not prepared to agree that under those circumstances we would acquiesce. For instance, suppose the Government of Russia should say it objected to receiving an American minister because somewhere he had expressed his opinion in favor of republican institutions compared with despotic institutions, I think when that communication was made the Government of the United States must simply say, "We all of us entertain those opinions over here, and that means we can not have any further diplomatic intercourse with you."

Mr. TELLER. That is just what I wanted to ask the Senator, if that is not where it comes—we discontinue diplomatic intercourse; but if we maintain diplomatic intercourse we must observe the rule.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; but the inquiry of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], like every inquiry which he makes in his place in the Senate, is an exceedingly pertinent and wise one—that is, whether a minister has been refused at a foreign court because of his entertaining sentiments temperately expressed which are entertained substantially by the entire people of the United States. It may very well be that the refusal to receive Mr. Blair is put upon grounds which bind the United States, with a due regard to their own honor and with respect to their own citizens, to at once withdraw the minister over there now on the ground that he entertains the same opinions. So I am not to be understood as objecting to the inquiry, but only preferring another mode of making it, and I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MORGAN. While this matter is up I desire to make one further observation. I understand the correct doctrine about a matter of this kind to be that if a foreign government in making an objection to a minister accredited to it states an objection to the mere personal character of the gentleman, or states an objection which is inconsequential to us but sufficient to that government for excluding him, we grant the objection and we recall the minister, because it is not a personal reflection upon him perhaps, or if so he can answer to his own people for it. But when a foreign government states an objection which wars upon our institutions and wars upon our Constitution and our practice under it, and holds a man accountable for the exercise of his constitutional rights to voice and vote his judgment and his conscience upon questions concerning that government upon some specific measure which is pending here, then it is our duty in my judgment as a general rule to resent that and say to that government that they have no right to inquire into our domestic affairs and institutions at all. We control them in our way by our own laws and Constitution.

A result of that came up in the case of the minister sent to Vienna, who was rejected by the court of Vienna on the ground that he was a Jew. That objection being made specific and connected with it some social debasement, perhaps, of that tribe of people in the court of that government, brought Mr. Bayard to say, as I remember, that the objection warred upon our institutions or upon the freedom of religion in the United States and the recognition that we gave to that tribe of people in their religion in this country, where religion is free everywhere, and that he could not accept that as being a sufficient reason for the withdrawal, and he declined to send anybody back in place of that gentleman.

Now, as this matter has spread out far beyond my intention—because I wanted the information, the use of the papers, merely in respect of the question coming up in the case of our trouble with Chile—and as the form of the resolution is a request to the President to send in the information or otherwise, as he may see proper, I have taken occasion to call attention to the fact that I believe it is the duty of this Government, as I understand the question, to resent the action on the part of the Government of China in refusing to accept a minister because he uttered words in debate which his conscience and judgment required he should utter for the benefit of his country on this floor.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he sits down. Would the Senator resent that by insisting that the minister should go, or by suspending diplomatic relations?

Mr. MORGAN. I would suspend diplomatic relations.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; that is the remedy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public service, to send to the Senate copies of the correspondence had with the Chinese Government relating to the nonacceptance of Hon. Henry W. Blair as minister of the United States to China.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM TEXAS.

Mr. HOAR. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the title of Mr. HORACE CHILTON to a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, reported by Mr. HOAR from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 25, 1892, as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. HORACE CHILTON, appointed by the executive of the State of Texas on the 25th day of April, 1891, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. John H. Reagan, which had previously been made, to take effect on the 10th day of June, 1891, is entitled to retain his seat.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a written report on the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. There is a written report, which is quite brief, and is on the tables of Senators, and can be read if Senators choose. I am not sure but that I can save the Senate the time it would take even to read the report, by making a brief statement, which I think will be satisfactory to everybody.

The only question in the case of Mr. CHILTON grows out of the fact that his predecessor, Mr. Reagan, resigned his seat in the Senate, and communicated that fact to the governor of Texas by letter, the resignation to take effect, according to his statement in the letter, at a future time. Thereupon, before the expiration of that time, the executive of the State of Texas, the Legislature not having been in session in the interval, appointed Mr. CHILTON, the appointment to take effect at a future time, the time fixed for the resignation of Mr. Reagan, The single question is whether the executive of a State can fill a vacancy in the Senate before it has actually happened and gone into operation.

I was myself under the impression that the early precedents had settled the question, as far as precedents can settle such a question, against the power of the governor of a State to make such an appointment. Under that apprehension, when Mr. CHILTON was sworn in, I moved in the Senate that the matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for its consideration. On examining the precedents, I am satisfied that there is nothing which prevents the Senate from dealing with the question as an original question or principle now. There are three cases where a Senator so appointed to fill a vacancy to take effect in the future has been admitted to his seat without objection and without raising the question. There are two or three other precedents where the governor has made an appointment under the circumstances which occurred in this case substantially where the Senator so appointed has been rejected, but it does not appear whether the rejection proceeded on the ground that the executive could not fill the vacancy before it occurred or upon the ground—the fact presenting that question also in all those cases—that the governor could not fill at all a vacancy happening at the beginning of a new term, because that was not a vacancy which "happened," within the phrase of the Constitution.

In regard to the principal case where that question might have occurred, the case of Mr. Lanman, of Connecticut, Judge Story, and the National Intelligencer of the next day (Judge Story being then a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and very familiar with what was going on here) say that the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman on the ground that the governor could not appoint until the vacancy had actually occurred. On the other hand, Mr. Benton and Mr. Felix Grundy in a subsequent report in the Sevier case, and Niles' Register of the next day, say it was put on the ground that the governor could not appoint until the vacancy had actually taken place. But there is nothing either in the vote of the Senate or in the report of the debates to show on which ground the Senate went.

That being the condition of the precedents we come simply to the matter as a question of principle, on which it seemed to me, and I believe finally to all the Committee of Privileges and Elections that the controlling purpose, the controlling consideration in determining such a matter should be the keeping of the seats of the Senate full. Very important public interests may be affected injuriously or favorably, great public questions may be decided by the vote of a single Senator, and if for any reason it becomes necessary where a Senator makes his resignation to take effect at a future time the executive has got to wait, there may be an interval of weeks or months before the seats can be full. In the case of States at a great distance from the seat of Government, like California, Oregon, and Washington, that would be a peculiar hardship on those people.

The whole tendency of the decisions in the Senate of recent years has been to give the construction to all these doubtful questions which tends to keep the seats in the Senate full. The Senate decided, after great debate, in the case of Mr. Bell of New Hampshire, and subsequently in the case of Mr. Blair, that the governor could appoint to a vacancy which occurred at the beginning of a constitutional term in order that the seat might be full, though in that case the governor of New Hampshire waited until the vacancy had actually taken place.

Then another very strong consideration or authority is that the Constitution uses precisely the same language in regard to the power of the President to fill vacancies in executive offices which occur during the recess of the Senate, and it has been invariably held in recent years that the President has the power to accept the resignation of an executive officer to take place in the future and to appoint an officer to fill the vacancy so occasioned by an appointment beforehand and also to take place in the future, an appointment before the vacancy happens.

So, if the Senate reject the rule which it is now proposed to lay down, you have got two clauses of the Constitution relating to filling vacancies in important public offices expressed in precisely or substantially the same language, which are to be expounded in two different ways. On the whole matter, therefore, I think the committee were quite clear that Mr. CHILTON is entitled to his seat.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Massachusetts does not understand that anything in this report, or anything in the decision in the case of Mr. Bell of New Hampshire, decides a question like this in a case where the Legislature fails to elect and the governor afterwards makes an appointment?

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I ought to have reminded Senators, what of course they all know as well as I do, that the question of the right of the governor after the Legislature has met after an interval and adjourned without making choice of a Senator after the vacancy has occurred to fill the vacancy depends on very different considerations, the Constitution saying that the executive has power to make an appointment to last until the next session of the Legislature. So this report and the action of the Senate, whatever it will take now, steers entirely clear of that question.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down, I should like to ask him one question by putting a case which might well happen. As I understand from him, the report adopted commits the Senate to the proposition that where there has been a resignation on the part of a member of this body, with a future date fixed when it shall take effect, the Senator holding the office until that date, the executive of the State may make the appointment of a successor before that time arrives. Now, I should like to ask the Senator what, in his opinion, would be the condition in view of this decision of the Senate, if in such a case it occurred that between the date of the resignation and the time of its taking effect, the executive of the State should change and the Senate should meet with two appointments before it?

The old executive in office at the time when the resignation is dated or between that time and when it takes effect makes an appointment and his appointee appears before the Senate; but the new executive who comes into office between the two dates of the resignation and its taking effect has also filled the vacancy, claiming that until the arrival of the time fixed no vacancy existed, what would the Senator do in a case like that and what would the Senate do in a case like that? It seems to me that on the doctrine he has stated the position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts might lead to great embarrassment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that the doctrine stated would lead at all to the result suggested by the Senator from Maine. In the first place the report in the case neither raises that question nor deals with it; and, in the next place, I suppose, speaking for one and without any purpose of committing any other member of the Senate, I suppose myself that when the executive of a State has made an appointment under the Constitution he has exhausted his power, which is neither revocable nor changeable by any subsequent authority either of himself or anybody else.

Suppose the State of Maine should elect a Senator to fill the seat of the honorable Senator from Maine when his term expires, and after that election should conclude for some reason, the Senator not having taken his seat, to make a new election or a new appointment. I do not suppose that either now or before the statute of 1866 anybody would for a moment agree that such an act was revocable. The power is completed, the exercise of it completed, the function is exhausted, and the title to the seat which takes effect in the future has vested in the person appointed.

Mr. HALE. That undoubtedly would be so if recognized as an existing power on the part of the governor; but suppose the ground is taken that it is a usurpation of power and the governor who succeeds appoints his man, then clearly the Senate would be confronted with the question whether a vacancy can be filled by the executive of a State before it actually exists.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see that that would change the attitude or aspect of this question at all, because if the governor had not the power to fill a vacancy until the seat was actually vacant, the action of the first governor would be null and void, of course.

Mr. PASCO. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to suggest to the Senator with reference to his answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that the Legislature which is to elect the successor of a Senator is prescribed by the statute, but there is no statute or rule prescribing which governor shall appoint and how long before the expected vacancy the power exists in the governor to appoint. For instance, a governor goes out of office in January, and he undertakes to fill a vacancy which does not occur until March.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think we get much assistance in deciding this question from that consideration, because the meaning of the Constitution was exactly the same before the statute of 1866, which for the first time controlled the Legislature as to the time of electing Senators, as it is now. I suppose it might happen possibly that a case would occur of a resignation to take effect a great while ahead and of a governor making an appointment a great while ahead, but practically that never has occurred and practically it never will occur, and the security against it must be like the security against almost every political evil in this world in the character of the persons whom the people trust with important legislative and executive power.

At any rate it seems to me that the fear that once in a thousand years it might happen that a Senator would resign his seat, the resignation to take effect in the remote future, and that a governor at the same time would make an appointment to take effect at that period in the remote future, and then there would be a change in the political power of the State, is so unlikely and rare a contingency that it ought not to be set against the certain and great inconvenience which would occur from the other construction, which is that whenever there is a resignation of a seat there must of course be an interregnum when a State is represented by one Senator or by none at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN CALIFORNIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII will be proceeded with.

The bill (S. 1207) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Alameda, in the State of California, was announced as first in order.

Mr. FELTON. My colleague [Mr. STANFORD], who is the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, is absent, and I desire that the bill, the title of which has been stated, and also Senate bills 1212, 1214, and 1215 for the erection of public buildings at San Diego, Oakland, and Los Angeles, Cal., respectively, may be passed upon the Calendar without prejudice; in other words, that they may be laid over until my colleague returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The request of the Senator will be granted, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT VIRGINIA CITY, NEV.

The bill (S. 55) for the erection of a public building at Virginia City, State of Nevada, was announced as next in order.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that that may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the bill will be passed over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT RENO, NEV.

The bill (S. 56) for the erection of a public building at Reno, State of Nevada, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fireproof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices, at the city of Reno, State of Nevada. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $75,000, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation in regard to the necessity of a public building at Reno.

Mr. STEWART. The town of Reno is at the junction of three railroads, one of which goes north and one south. It is a distributing point, and there is a great deal of business there. It would be a great convenience to have a public building there, because it is a growing town, and is going to be a large one. It will ultimately be one of the principal points on the east side of the mountain. The town contains now about 5,000 inhabitants. I observe that the census has omitted the number of inhabitants, and omits the town altogether, in connection with many small towns in the State. I do not know how the omission has occurred. Reno is the most growing business town outside of the mining camps in the State. It would be a great convenience to have a public building there, and it will soon be a public necessity.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Nevada states, I believe, that the census omits any mention of this town. I find that the census report gives the population as 3,500.

Mr. STEWART. What census report does the Senator refer to?

Mr. McPHERSON. The recent census report gives the population at 3,500.

Mr. STEWART. Reno?

Mr. McPHERSON. Reno, in the State of Nevada. This is a statement which has been prepared for me, and which I assume to be correct, though I have not verified it.

Mr. STEWART. I will send for the census report.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is the statement. I do not know it to be correct.

Mr. STEWART. I am certain that is an underestimate. That probably is taken from the census report of 1880. Reno is one of the towns which has grown considerably. It is a thriving, business town. The Senator's information is evidently derived from the census report of 1880.

Mr. McPHERSON. If it is proper to make such an inquiry at this particular time, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, considering, as I think, that that committee should consider the present admitted distressed condition of the Treasury and the uncertainty as regards future revenues, whether it is possible to go on in this indiscriminate way appropriating hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars for public buildings all over this country in unimportant places?

There are great predictions made as to all of these places and they will unquestionably in the future become great and prosperous cities and communities; but is it not quite right to ask that, in consideration of the condition of the Treasury at present, we should withhold some of these extravagant appropriations until such time as these small towns shall assume greater proportions than they now have?

I should like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he can give the Senate any kind of approximate estimate of how much money we have appropriated for public buildings all over the United States, not in one State only, but all over the country, at the last session of Congress, and how much is left for this session to bestow.

Mr. ALLISON. My attention was diverted for a moment from the inquiry of the Senator from New Jersey. If I understand him, he desires to know how much money has been expended by the Government of the United States for public buildings.

Mr. McPHERSON. How much money it would be safe to appropriate during this Congress for the erection of public buildings, considering the condition of the Treasury. I assume that, with the little money in the Treasury and with less probably coming in in the future, it behooves us to be somewhat careful and economical with respect to appropriations. That naturally follows.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the general view of the Senator from New Jersey that it is not wise to make extravagant appropriations for public buildings at this time or, indeed, at any other time. I should not like to undertake myself at this moment to discriminate between the flourishing and enterprising city of Reno, which I understand to be a prosperous city——

Mr. STEWART. Very.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the statement of the Senator from Nevada—and other prosperous cities and towns in other portions of the United States, Kansas City, Mo., for example, and in Nebraska, where we have recently, I see, appropriated $250,000 for a public building at Norfolk, and $150,000 for another public building at some other place in Nebraska—Beatrice, I think.

Mr. PADDOCK. No, sir. Hastings and Norfolk are both towns in which terms of the Federal court are held twice a year. They were bills reintroduced from the last session and which passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not criticising at this moment any of these appropriations, but if we are to appropriate $250,000 for public buildings in each of the growing and prosperous cities in our Western country, and particularly in my own State, I should have some fear that there might not be money enough in the Treasury to erect all these public buildings and at the same time provide for other necessary expenditures in carrying on the great work of the Government; but I should not like at this moment to give what might be termed a black eye to the bill for a public building at Reno by any statement of mine, because I notice that the appropriation is only $75,000, and that it is not to be a continuing appropriation.

Mr. STEWART. I will state here that I am prepared to reduce the amount to $60,000. We can erect a building there for $60,000, I think. I will agree to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Then we shall save $15,000 at least by this debate. I agree with the Senator from Nevada that $60,000 will probably erect a very good and a fairly fireproof building at Reno.

Now, I would admonish, as I understood the Senator from New Jersey to admonish by his observations, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, composed as it is of the most experienced and able members in this body, and economical as well, that it is not wise to amplify and enlarge too rapidly the appropriations for public buildings.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Jersey got his bill through.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad to hear that. I did not know that the Senator from New Jersey was able to secure the passage of his bill. I have no doubt it was a meritorious one. It passed during my absence from the Chamber.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will permit the interruption, that bill provided for the completion of a building that was halfway up. We did not ask for an appropriation for a new building in that case, but for one that was partially constructed. We merely wanted to put a roof on a building which was partially built.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad to know that whatever the Senator desired to secure in that respect he has been able to secure. I have no doubt, I would say to the Senator from New Jersey, that there is money enough in the Treasury and will be money enough in the Treasury, through the operation of our revenue laws, to carry on prudently, carefully, and economically the expenditures of this Government for the next fiscal year, which is the one, I believe, we are now proposing to appropriate for.

At some later day and at some more opportune time, when the Senate is interested in this topic, I shall be glad to discuss the general question of appropriations which can be made usefully, and some which I think ought not to be made at all. I will also undertake in some sense to show the resources of the Treasury. I do not think at this moment, however, inasmuch as my friend from Nevada has agreed to reduce the amount of the appropriation in this case to $60,000, that it will be necessary for me to go into that subject to-day.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I simply wish to state, in defense of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—if the word "defense" be preferred by anybody, "or if," as the Senator in front of me [Mr. MORGAN] says, "it be necessary"—that there has been a continual struggle between that committee and the remainder of the Senate, almost without a single exception, to prevent large appropriations and unnecessary appropriations for public buildings.

Of all the public duties I am called upon to discharge, my service upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is the most irksome, the most unpleasant, and the most ungrateful.

The bills which are now being considered here are bills that were deliberately passed by the Senate at the last session, sent over to the House of Representatives, and failed to become laws. All these objections are in the nature of motions for a new trial after a judgment was rendered by the Senate, without objection, at the last session, and after the bills had passed from us to the coördinate branch of Congress.

My opinions with regard to public buildings, if they are worth anything, have been expressed so often that it is simply iteration for me to repeat them again. I believe the Government of the United States should own the buildings necessary to carry on its business of every department of the Government. I believe that the Government is able, and that it is wise policy and good business management to erect for itself the necessary buildings for the Post-Office Department, for judicial purposes, and for internal-revenue purposes, and there is no excuse now for the Congress of the United States that in this city of Washington we are paying one hundred and eighty-odd thousand dollars or more rent annually when we have had, whatever is the case now, an overflowing Treasury and real estate was rapidly advancing in this city and in all the other cities of the country.

In regard to buildings for post-offices, if Senators will turn to Order of Business No. 18 they will see a bill which was carefully prepared after consultation with all the heads of Departments, providing for the erection of buildings at a cost not exceeding $25,000 for post-offices in every town and city in the United States where the revenues of the postal service for three years in that city or town have amounted to $3,000 annually. If the Senate and the House of Representatives would take up that bill and pass it, then this great abuse of which we have heard so much recently would be done away with, and yet that bill was reported here and stayed upon the Calendar all last session. I called it up, and the late Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner] and myself finally secured the consideration of it here for some two or three hours, when it was shoved out of the way for some private claim, and that was the last heard of it. The other day when it was reached upon the Calendar some Senator objected to its consideration, and it stands here now passed over in order that we may take up other public building bills and other proposed legislation far less important, and which has given rise to all this debate.

Mr. President, I admit that there have been extravagant expenditures, and it will be so until the world is wrapped in millenial glory, and somebody will get through a bill here for more money than he ought to have for a public building. It will always be so. Of all the expenditures that are made by this Government the most defensible are those for public buildings. You spend money on your rivers and harbors, you put in hundreds and thousands and millions of dollars, and in the spring a freshet comes and it all goes and there is nothing to show for it. You spend thousands of dollars here in paying claims which are doubtful at best, and they go into the hands of private individuals and the people at large receive no direct benefit from them. When you erect a public building you have there the insignia of your country's greatness, and even in the material and business aspects of the case, you get rid of paying rent, you own something, you have got an interest in a growing town or city, at any rate, upon the soil of our own country, it stands there, and it shows something for the money. It is by far the best expenditure we could make.

I know now it is exceedingly popular in the public prints and in other places to talk about the enormous expenditures for public buildings. Great as those expenditures are, I can point to some material and positive evidences of the fact that the Government and the people have received something in return for the money which has been paid out.

When our committee attempts to economize and to pass a general bill, against which there can be no real objection, the Senate refuses to take it up, and then we hear rounded sentences in regard to enormous expenditures!

My friend from New Jersey has never introduced a single public building bill that has not been passed—not one. I have reported for him myself every bill that he has ever sent to our committee, and the other day when he asked for an additional appropriation, caused by a mistake of his own of $10,000, I advocated that that amendment should be placed on the bill, but he indignantly rejected it. His course here is neither in accordance with fair legislation nor Christian usage, for he is returning evil for good, and has rejected an appropriation which one of the committee at least, and I believe all of them, agreed should have been made—an amendment to give him $10,000 more than the bill carried.

These facts, Mr. President, it seems to me, will answer a great many objections which are made here.

As to this particular appropriation recommended by the Supervising Architect, it was recommended to our committee by the Senators from Nevada, and all the evidence was concurrent to the effect that the Government was paying large rents in this town, and it needed this building, that the town was rapidly improving, that real estate was going up, and that to refuse to make this purchase and erect this edifice would be contrary to all the rules which any good business man would adopt. I voted for it in committee and shall vote for it here, and will take my portion of the responsibility before the country for supporting the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, a single word in reply to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. He speaks of the necessity for public buildings in the city of Washington, all of which I admit. He states that the Government is paying $180,000 a year rent for buildings in the city of Washington, where the Government should own them. That I admit. If the money appropriated in this bill and in many other bills which come before the Senate was for the purpose of constructing necessary public buildings in the city of Washington it should have my vote. I will vote for all necessary amounts of money to construct public buildings in the city of Washington and in every other place where they are really needed for the uses and purposes of the Government; but I should like to have the Senator from Missouri answer me this question: If the city of Washington is paying out to-day $180,000 a year rental for the use of public buildings, why is it that we take $100,000 of the money that might be appropriated profitably to Washington and put it in Salem, Oregon, where the census report shows it has a population of less than a thousand? Why should we put it in Reno, in the State of Nevada, where the census report shows a population of 3,500, which the Senator from that State himself admits that the necessity for a public building there is in the future?

Mr. STEWART. The figures given by the Senator are from the census report of 1880. There is no report of the population of Reno by the last census.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well. While we are upon this subject, let us get right upon it. I did ask for an appropriation of $25,000 or $30,000 the other day to complete a public building at Hoboken, N. J., a place of about 50,000 people. All that we asked for was $100,000 until my attention was called to it by a member of the other House, who thought it was impossible to complete the sidewalks, furnish the necessary heating apparatus, and things of that kind about the building, and it had been stated to him by the Department that the amount would hardly be sufficient to complete the building as it should be completed. Therefore, I proposed to the Senator from Missouri as a member of the committee, and he very kindly assented, that I might move an amendment to the bill asking for $10,000 additional, but it was very reluctantly granted, as I saw, by the Senate, and therefore I withdrew the amendment.

Now, let us compare that public building and that request with some other bills which appear on the Calendar. We have passed over this morning five or six bills in succession upon the Calendar for the State of California. I will call attention specially to one of them.

There is an appropriation of $350,000 for a public building in Los Angeles, Cal., and that is proposed to be a continuing appropriation. I have been informed that $150,000 has already been appropriated. Now, what is the size of that city? It has a population of 50,395, and the entire cost for a building at Los Angeles, Cal., is therefore $500,000, and the population is about the same as Hoboken, N. J.

In order that the Senate may understand exactly the policy which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are pursuing, I will state the facts so far as the State of California is concerned. At the last session of Congress $1,360,000 was appropriated for public buildings in the State of California. In those appropriations was one for $450,000 for the purchase of a site for a public building at San Francisco.

I am now told that it will require $800,000 to purchase the site. To this sum of $1,360,000 we will add the item of $1,075,000 for five more public building bills for the State of California, all on the Calendar, all in a row, and all reported to the Senate with the recommendation that they pass.

This makes $2,435,000 for the State of California appropriated in two sessions of Congress; but this is not all. My attention has just been called to a bill now pending in the Committee on Public Grounds and Buildings, which appropriates $500,000 to begin a public building in the city of San Francisco, and then mortgages the future for $3,000,000 more to complete it.

In short, if all these bills favorably reported and others which seem sure to be are passed by Congress, California will have taken $6,000,000 out of the public Treasury for public buildings in eighteen months.

I have no doubt the Senator from Missouri can explain why it is that in one State in this Union, being now provided with a public building in every city in the State which has a population of 10,000, not one is omitted if the bills on the Calendar now before the Senate are passed. I hope the Senator will explain how one State can come here and take $2,400,000 out of the public Treasury for public buildings, appropriating $500,000 for a single building, where confessedly the population is only 50,000, while there are so many other places in the United States, notably the city of Washington, in which the Government is paying a rental of $180,000 a year for the use of its buildings. It seems to me that that is not exactly the proper way to legislate. I may be wrong about it, and my judgment may not be sound upon this question, but certainly I think some change is necessary with respect to the discrimination, or rather the want of discrimination, which is practiced with regard to the location of public buildings by the committee.

We run along down the Calendar, and what do we find? We find that bills have been reported with large sums for public buildings for one place with a population of 2,186, another with a population of 3,560, another with a population of 4,900, and so on. If it be necessary, in addition to the wants for post-office purposes, that we should have court buildings or for other public uses in that Western country, that the Government should erect a public building at a moderate cost, I will gladly vote for such appropriation of money, but I wish to say here and now that I will not permit by my vote the State of California to take in one year $6,000,000 out of the public Treasury and invest it in public buildings upon the soil of that State when other States that are seeking for small and modest appropriations have been unable to secure them, and this is the case in cities having populations of sixty, seventy, and eighty thousand, which have never had a public building. I will not vote for extravagant appropriations to fill one State with public buildings to the neglect of another. Mr. President, I have twice called attention to this careless insidious, inconsiderate legislation, and hereafter shall content myself with voting against these bills without further reminders.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator's allusion to California was unfortunate for him. The city of San Francisco contains a population, I think, of over 300,000. It has no public building, except a little old building that was put up away back about 1855 for a custom-house, and which is hardly fit for occupancy. Efforts have been made for the last twenty years to have a public building erected in San Francisco, but they have failed. An appropriate site could probably have been purchased ten or fifteen years ago for one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868, on which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Alabama will give way until the pending bill can be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MORGAN. How long does the Senator from Nevada expect to occupy the floor?

Mr. STEWART. Five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield for five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada may proceed.

Mr. STEWART. At the request of the Senator from California [Mr. FELTON] I will let the bill go over, but I want this question in regard to San Francisco ventilated. I think the charge that California has been especially favored is so unfounded and so unjust that I desire the matter thoroughly discussed. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MEXICAN COMMISSION AWARDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 539) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico," concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in my effort yesterday to give a rather narrative form to the history of this transaction I had reached the point of stating that the United States Government, through its act of Congress, had provided for several methods for distributing this award and several conditions upon which that part of it which was made in favor of the La Abra Silver Mining Company and Weil should be distributed. I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, had declined to permit the Government of Mexico to bring a suit in our courts of equity for the purpose of determining the rightfulness of those two awards to the fund then partly paid over. I suppose that Mr. Evarts, when we look at the diplomatic view of the question, was right in his denial of this remedy to Mexico; but it has since turned out that, whether he was right or wrong, Mexico could not have maintained its suit for the reason that it had yielded through the action of this convention all of its interest in the fund and had no right at its own suit to ask a court of chancery to direct how the money should be paid or that it should be returned to Mexico. So, in any view of the case, Mr. Evarts seems to have been correct in his indication of what the remedy was, that it was to be a judicial investigation according to an act of Congress, and in a domestic tribunal. I showed yesterday that it was necessary that it should be at the suit of the United States, because Mr. Bayard, while he was Secretary of State, had made the distinct offer to the claimants of the Weil fund and the claimants of the La Abra award that they would consent to go into the Court of Claims and have the controversy between the United States and these claimants there settled according to the provisions of our statute.

Then there remains but one thing to do, and that is for Congress to execute that part of the statute which requires that in the event of a failure to dispose of this fund by agreement with Mexico or otherwise it shall be disposed of as Congress shall direct.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. That proposition of Secretary Bayard, if I remember aright, was very promptly rejected by the claimants, was it not?

Mr. MORGAN. It was rejected by the claimants, and they put in quite a protest, quite a petition, to show they had a right to this fund, independent of its merits and its equities; that it was a fund that had been decreed to them by the convention; that it was supported by the inviolability of our treaties, and that it was a vested right which no one had authority to dispute, the Government of the United States or any other party.

Mr. FRYE. I simply wanted that to appear in connection with the Senator's argument.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. The only remaining duty that is in view for the Government of the United States to determine—that means Congress—is what disposition shall be made of this fund.

Now, I take the ground, Mr. President, and I have always taken it, and it has been supported by the action of four different Administrations which have acted upon these questions, that the Secretary of State has no right to pay out this money to anybody until Congress shall further direct.

The view of that statute which is taken in the concluding remarks of Chief Justice Fuller in the case of Boynton vs. Blaine I think is conclusive. For the present I will merely call attention to those observations to see whether I am not sustained in the proposition that no one can touch this fund for the purpose of distributing or paying it to any person unless by the further action of the Congress of the United States. The part of the opinion to which I now call attention is as follows:

> On the contrary, that control was expressly reserved, for it was made the duty of the President, if of opinion that the cases named should be retried, to withhold payment until such retrial could be had in an international tribunal, if the two Governments so agreed, or in a domestic tribunal if Congress so directed, and, at all events, until Congress should otherwise direct. The fact that a difference of view as to whether the retrial should be international or domestic may have arisen and led to delay, or that such difference may have existed on the merits, does not affect the conclusion. The inaction of Congress is not equivalent to a direction by Congress. The political department has not parted with its power over the matter, and the intervention of the judicial department can not now be invoked.

It requires, of course, another act of Congress to invoke the intervention of the judicial department, and that is all it does require.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator a question just there. Certain amounts of money were paid out by the Secretary of State. I suppose the Senator does not contend but that the Secretary of State had authority to make those payments. What has changed the aspect of the case that has since those payments removed from him the power still to pay out if he is disposed to do so?

Mr. MORGAN. The President of the United States had not acted upon this matter conclusively, as I understand, until after some of the payments were made; and then there was some doubt in the mind of the Secretaries and of the Presidents, too, as to whether they had a right to make additional payments pending further negotiations with Mexico or pending a trial that might be provided for by act of Congress. At all events partial payments were made; the matter passed beyond the power of the Government in the fact of their payment, and the pending bill expressly excepts those payments from its operation. It would be entirely useless to undertake to recover the money paid, as could be done upon the precedent in the Gardiner case; but there was misunderstanding and misconception of the authority of the President over this subject until the Supreme Court in its investigation pronounced finally upon those questions.

I contend now, Mr. President, I repeat, as I have always contended that until the political power of this Government was exercised in a manner to authorize a distribution of these awards no one had the right to distribute them. Until it had been first ascertained by the President of the United States upon a full investigation that the honor of the United States and the principles of justice and equity required the payment, these awards should be withheld. That was the exercise of what we might term a special jurisdiction on the part of an agent of the Government, the President there acting as the agent of the Government and not in his capacity of President. That agent was to determine upon an investigation of all the facts connected with this transaction whether in his opinion the honor of the United States and the principles of public law of equity and justice, required that this money should be withheld until an agreement could be had with Mexico for its disbursement, or until some tribunal could be found that had jurisdiction of it, or until the Congress of the United States should otherwise direct. When after a full investigation, which was made upon all the evidence submitted to Mr. Evarts, and by very careful argument made, as found in the record of this case, on both sides of the question, and by great lawyers too, the President decided that the condition upon which the payment was to be suspended actually existed as provided in the act of Congress, then it was beyond his power or the power of anybody else, in my judgment, to go on and make these payments, and it is beyond his power to do it to-day.

I maintain that these awardees can not get anything out of these awards except by the assistance of Congress, and I think that the question was presented in such direct form in the decision of the case of Boynton vs. Blaine, as that Chief Justice Fuller was warranted in making that declaration of law in respect of it which I have just quoted, and which does debar these claimants from any legal right to this fund in any respect and which debars also the Secretary of State or the President from making a payment until that judgment is recalled and that fact wiped out.

The Congress of the United States might have contented itself with acting simply upon that declaration of Mr. Hayes. It could have done so in justice to the claimants and in justice to all concerned, to the Government of the United States, and to Mexico too, so far as its wounded sensibilities could be involved in this matter or so far as its right of ultimate reclamation upon the fund may be involved. We might have said, the President of the United States having investigated this subject upon the evidence produced by both parties, as he did, and having come to the conclusion that the condition provided in the act existed, that it was not in harmony with the principles of justice and honor, or the honor of the United States, or with public law, or with public morality that this money should be paid, therefore we would proceed upon that ascertainment to find some remedy which was sufficient to accomplish the purposes of the act of 1878. That subject was very much debated here at the time the treaty came up for ratification, and it has been debated before the committees of both Houses of Congress very thoroughly since that time.

The Foreign Relations Committee of this body concluded that it was their duty (in fact the resolution so instructed them in the La Abra case) to make a special investigation, to ascertain what? Whether the President had made a misjudgment in deciding under the authority of that act that the honor of the United States and public law and public morality did require that there should be a retrial of these causes in some form and by some tribunal. So the committee have gone on, and under the special requirement of the Senate by a resolution to that effect in the La Abra case, have summoned witnesses, and have brought in original papers, and have conducted, as far as such a committee could possibly conduct such an inquiry, a thorough judicial investigation, with counsel present, with the right to object and except, and all that, as far as the committee could possibly extend that right to them in the inquiry. And we have come back here with a report in these cases which has been reaffirmed by various committees of both Houses, to the effect that the President of the United States made a just decision, and that he arrived at a just conclusion; and that he laid the predicate by his decision and the report of it to the Congress of the United States, upon which it became our duty to provide some means of executing the original act of Congress.

As that matter is up now, I will call attention to the provisions of the act, which has been read time and again, but it will bear further reading, and to one little point in connection with the history of its enactment. When Mr. Fish, who was a very sagacious lawyer as well as a very able statesman, found the duty incumbent upon him to make a disposal of these awards in accordance with the finding of the commissioners, he saw that the convention had not provided the method of distribution, nor had it provided the agency through which the distribution was to be made, except that each Government was to have its decree against the other for whatever amount of money the commission might find to be due to that Government from the other.

Mr. Fish, therefore, in bringing the subject to the attention of Congress, recommended that an act of distribution be passed, thereby conceding, as every person is bound to concede, that the award itself did not carry to the executive department of this Government the right or the power to distribute, but that it must be supplemented and assisted by an act of Congress providing the manner in which the awards should be distributed. In the mean time the controversy had arisen, or rather it had existed all the time, but it had been presented by the Government of Mexico in such a form as to satisfy the Congress of the United States that there was merit in its objection to the validity of these claims and to the methods by which the claims had been established before the Commission. So the fifth section of the act contains a whereas:

> And whereas the Government of Mexico has called the attention of the Government of the United States to the claims hereinafter named with a view to a rehearing, therefore be it enacted, that the President of the United [States] be, and he is hereby, requested to investigate any charges of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the cases hereinafter named, and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity require that the awards in the cases of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, or either of them, should be opened and the cases retried, it shall be lawful for him to withhold payment of said awards, or either of them, until such case or cases shall be retried and decided in such manner as the Governments of the United States and Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct. And in case of such retrial and decision, any moneys paid or to be paid by the Republic of Mexico in respect of said awards, respectively, shall be held to abide the event, and shall be disposed of accordingly; and the said present awards shall be set aside, modified, or affirmed as may be determined on such retrial:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as an expression of any opinion of Congress in respect to the character of said claims or either of them.

Following up that form of legislation and having some respect to our own character, and also not to the obligation but the attitude this act placed us in with respect to Mexico, it was very proper that the Congress of the United States should adopt some measure for the distribution of these awards which accorded with this act—not confined precisely to it, for the power was reserved in Congress to dispose of these awards hereafter in the event that the President should find that those conditions existed which obstructed the payment of the funds into the hands of the persons to whom they had been awarded.

It is said here that there is no expression of opinion one way or the other to be implied from this act. That should have been the situation of this case up to this moment of time. The matter should have gone to the courts of the United States without the necessity of any expression of opinion. But whenever a bill has been attempted to be passed here in any form (and several different kinds of bills have been presented), immediately the claimants to this fund would arise here, and arise at other places too, and make powerful demonstration against any action by Congress for the distribution of this money, except to pay it to them, upon the ground that the Mexican Government was a false claimant, had been negligent, derelict in the presentation of its claim; that a great length of time had transpired, and that new interests, vested rights upon consideration, had intervened; and in every way that is imaginable it has been insisted that Congress would act unjustly and inequitably and in violation of law and treaty obligation to make any disposal of this fund which would interrupt the claimants in their grasp upon it. So the matter has always run into that channel of debate whenever it has been here considered.

So desperate was the resistance made in respect of the La Abra claim that the Senate found it necessary to instruct its committee to do what? To revise the action of the President in effect, to find out whether the President in deciding that these conditions existed to prohibit the payment had acted judiciously or wisely, whether he had been deceived, and all that; whether a book of original correspondence which was kept at the mines that had been discovered was a forged document in part or in whole, or whether it was one gotten up surreptitiously for the purpose of enabling two of the agents of that company to rob the company of its rights, etc.

The clamor became so great, the demonstration was so strong, the urgency was so desperate in this body as to delay from time to time any action of the Senate whenever it could be done. Finally the Senate concluded that it would refer the La Abra claim again to its own committee and have them investigate the matter. Hence we are here with our report in obedience to that resolution, expressing our opinion upon this matter after long, laborious, careful, and, I trust, honest investigation, that the claim was founded in fraud, supported by perjury, unjust in every sense, and scandalous to any government that had been imposed upon to the extent of having it presented for the consideration of another friendly power against whom the demand was made. Therefore we are drawn into a discussion of the merits of these different claims by the action of the claimants themselves, who are not willing to take the judgment of the President of the United States in the matter.

It has turned out in the course of the progress of this affair that four Presidents have acted upon it deliberately, commencing with Mr. Hayes, then Mr. Arthur, then Mr. Cleveland, and then Mr. Harrison. Each one has affirmed, if possible, with more and more pronounced determination, the existence of the fact that these awards were procured by fraud and perjury, and that it would dishonor this Government to pay them. So we have been forced here to come forward and open this vast debate to the Senate of the United States. The subject has been virtually transferred from the jurisdiction where the act of 1878 vested it, in the President who should make the investigation and make the determination for the Government, to the hands of the committees of the different Houses of Congress. The longer we have gone into the investigation the more serious has become the difficulty of getting the proof; but still it seems almost providentially to have been preserved in such form as that the law, good conscience, equity, and justice stand here side by side with the committee to recommend what they have done and to indicate what the judgment of the Senate ought to be now.

What judgment can these 88 Senators form upon the mass of evidence in this cause? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] the other day pointed out in a few brief words the impossibility of the Senate understanding thoroughly all of this case unless they should do like some of us have been compelled to do, as I have been compelled to do very reluctantly for twelve years, to probe through this vast mass of testimony, compare fact with fact and witness with witness, and come to a conclusion which I suppose and the entire committee suppose, so far as I know now, is a just conclusion upon law, equity, justice, public conscience, public policy.

I had supposed early in this case that when a committee of this body came forward and said that a particular measure of legislation was necessary to enable the President of the United States to execute this act of Congress, and that the President had determined upon the necessity of such act because he had found, upon an investigation, that it was requisite, made so by the act itself, that would be enough to put Congress in motion, and that was really all that should have been done. Here, after years of labor, we are still challenged by an investigation of the facts for the purpose of doing what, now? Setting aside the judgment of the President and the judgment of three successive Presidents following upon that, embodied in long reports, in very accurate and painstaking statements that the first adjudication by Mr. Hayes, which was conducted by Mr. Evarts, as I have said, where able counsel were employed on both sides, was a correct and a just judgment upon the case.

Congress desired to withhold the expression of its opinion, which might prejudice the cause in the tribunal before which it might go, in order that when the tribunal was established we might have a full and fair trial on both sides without prejudice from opinion or intimations on the part of members of Congress. That would have been the proper way to have transacted this business, but I say we could not help ourselves.

When this subject was first being considered by the Government of the United States, when a remedy was being sought in a treaty which was negotiated between Mexico and the United States and the matter came into the Senate, there was quite a long period of delay by objections made of one sort and another, which I do not know that I am at liberty to refer to here now, the matter having been transacted in an executive session.

But great delay occurred. While that treaty was under consideration, it being apprehended by Weil that his claim would necessarily go by the board, that the treaty would be ratified as to him, and that he would have to go before a new tribunal, he went into the district court of the United States pending that treaty and filed his petition for a mandamus against Mr. Frelinghuysen, and required Mr. Frelinghuysen to go into court as Secretary of State and answer upon oath. He did so, and an answer was made by that venerable statesman, a man whose reputation will last many years in this country as a bright illustration of the honor of the American citizen and statesman. When that Secretary of State came into court and swore to the facts in that case as they appeared upon record, there was an immutable answer to Mr. Weil's case, and yet he had not as yet penetrated to the bottom of this fraud. But there was enough apparent upon the papers which had been lodged in the office of the Secretary of State to enable Mr. Frelinghuysen to swear that the claim was an unjust one, and was founded in fraud and perjury. Senators who choose to look at that affidavit will find a very strong statement from a very able and a good man upon his conscience in regard to this business. That delayed the action of the Senate.

After the supreme court of the District of Columbia had acted upon that mandamus and refused to grant it, Weil took his appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and further action upon that treaty and upon this case had to be deferred until that court could reach this case in the midst of its enormously clogged and encumbered docket and finally make a decision.

Then we took it up, and the question was raised as presented by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday, whether after all Congress had not made some mistake in providing that the treaty power should dispose of a question where it was pretty plain that the subject-matter was not within the treaty-making power as it is defined in the Constitution of the United States.

That question came up, and the Senate came to the conclusion that the remedy had after all been mistaken by the President in the negotiation of that treaty, and that Mr. Evarts's opinion was correct, that this matter should be heard in a judicial tribunal of domestic creation, and solely at the suit of the United States, Mexico not being admitted to be a party in any respect or at any time or under any circumstances.

Then it went back. The bill was introduced here and referred to the committee, and it came into the Senate of the United States with a report in favor of the bill. Various earnest efforts were made to get the bill up for consideration, and it never could be gotten up for consideration. Mr. Bayard, however, had in one of his communications, which I have before me now, but will not stop to read, at the present moment at least, in his anxiety to have this matter disposed of, intimated very strongly if he did not say that unless Congress disposed of this matter in some way the Department would free itself of this money by paying it out to these claimants.

Mr. Bayard did not live many months after that until he discovered that he made a mistake in that suggestion, but it was put in merely for the purpose of hastening action on our part. He found after a subsequent investigation, which appears in a subsequent letter of his on the same subject to a different session of Congress or a different Congress, that he did not have the right to pay the money out; that until Congress should have otherwise directed the fund was held in his hands subject to the decision which had been made by the President of the United States that the honor of this country and other considerations required that the money should not be paid to the claimants. He saw, then, as we all see now, that the President of the United States was not a political entity; that Mr. Hayes having made this decision, it was the decision also of each and all of his successors, and was final until Congress chose to dispense with it. The President of the United States who succeeds Mr. Harrison can not, under the provisions of that act of Congress, reverse the decision he has made that this money ought not to be paid out. That is a fact ascertained in a manner prescribed by Congress, and it stands irrevocable until the lawmaking power of this country has dispensed with it.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Has not more than one Secretary of State, and if so, how many, held that this claim ought to be reinvestigated?

Mr. MORGAN. Four.

Mr. GEORGE. Who are they?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Evarts, Mr. Blaine, who during Garfield's Administration wrote a dispatch to that effect——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Frelinghuysen?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Evarts, Mr. Frelinghuysen, Mr. Bayard, and Mr. Blaine, the present Secretary of State.

Mr. GEORGE. All concur in the point that it is our duty to reëxamine this matter?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; they not only concur in that view, but the present Secretary of State has had another opportunity to have this question decided in a court of justice, the Supreme Court of the United States.

When the bill came back from the committee again and a delay carried it down to a period in the session when it was impossible to consider it and an adjournment took place, a resolution was offered here and passed requesting the President of the United States to hold the matter in suspense because Congress had not had an opportunity to pass upon it. The resolution was unnecessary when a proper consideration of the measure enacted is had, but still it had its effect; Mr. Bayard would not pay the money, and pleaded that resolution as an excuse why he would not pay it until the matter could be considered by Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Was that a resolution of the Senate or of both Houses?

Mr. MORGAN. It was a resolution of the Senate. I think probably the resolution went through both Houses, but it was not a concurrent resolution. At all events a statement went down from the chairman of the committee in the other House which corresponded exactly with the resolution of the Senate and made the same request. Then both bills went back again to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Then we made a report as soon as it was possible to make a report. We got into those times of great political turmoil and disturbance when it was impossible to consider anything that was not political and did not have relation to a political subject.

Fearing, however, that the Congress of the United States had studied the matter up and had come to a resolution really in the minds of members of both Houses, that this thing should be brought to a conclusion and that it should be brought to its close in a domestic tribunal which should be empowered to pass upon it finally and forever, another mandamus was sued out, this time by Mr. Boynton, who somebody has, impiously I suppose, called Poker Boynton. That is the only name I know him by. Mr. Boynton came in with his writ of mandamus against Mr. Blaine. He took the ground first, that Mexico had no right of action in any court to recover this money. That is conceded. He took the ground, secondly, that the real jurisdiction in the case, according to the act of Congress, if not according to the Constitution, was in the treaty-making power, and that inasmuch as the treaty that had been made was not ratified but rejected, there was a conclusive determination in his favor that this award was to stand. He made that point, and it was argued with such great ability that the district court of the United States here granted the mandamus and ordered Mr. Blaine to pay out the money.

Thereupon Mr. Blaine, in the name of the United States, took his appeal to the Supreme Court, and here was another delay of many months, years in fact, caused by the intervention or interposition of this new writ of mandamus. That led to the decision which I have been reading from here to-day of Chief Justice Fuller, which, in connection with the decision of Chief Justice Waite in the case of Weil vs. Frelinghuysen, disposes of every one of these celebrated law questions which have been mooted and argued and discussed here, and upon which the Senate has hung in doubt from year to year.

But in disposing of these law questions, making a final adjudication upon every point which has ever been raised in this case, great time has been consumed. Now, who has consumed it? With what grace does the complaint come from the mouths of these claimants that so much time has elapsed that it is almost impossible now to know exactly whether you are doing justice to them or not, if you get into the merits? Whenever it was found that the merits of these cases were about to be brought under the touch of judicial inquiry by act of Congress, then objection and obstruction of every kind was resorted to; mandamus after mandamus, appeal after appeal to the tardy action of the Supreme Court was had, and in the end, when they have exhausted all of their objections, and they have all been answered by the Supreme Court of the United States, they raise again the question whether Mr. Hayes decided correctly in finding that there was fraud and perjury in the obtaining of these awards in the first instance. That throws this question open here to-day. That is the situation.

Now, I maintain, Mr. President, and I will state it again, because I maintain it with great earnestness, that nobody can dispose of this fund until Congress shall otherwise direct than has been attempted to be directed heretofore. These claimants can not get a dollar of it until that action is taken by the Congress of the United States, and if that had been known or believed sufficiently, presented as it is in the opinion of Chief Justice Fuller, eight or ten years ago this thing would have been settled as far back as that.

The argument made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] upon the La Abra case is based upon the original record which went before the Commission upon the testimony which was produced on a motion for a rehearing before the umpire in that case, and then upon the testimony produced before the Senate committee, the object of that last investigation being chiefly to wipe out, if it was proper to do so, certain objections which had been made to the validity or the integrity of the testimony which was set up here in opposition to the payment of these awards.

While the argument of the Senator from Oregon does not cover the whole case in every particular by any means, it has reached the salient points of controversy, and I think it can be safely left to that argument as a demonstration in a merely persuasive argument to support the previous adjudication and decision of the President of the United States, followed by three other Presidents and four Secretaries of State: but it is a demonstration upon the evidence in the cause that that award was obtained by fraud and perjury.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in attempting to make some excuse or criticism, or whatever he intended it should be, upon this matter, referred in very uncomplimentary terms to his main witness, Mr. Exall. Strike Exall's testimony out of the case and there never was a shred in it. The whole case centers right upon the question whether the facts related by Exall while he was there in possession of that property as the agent of the company were true or whether they were false. When this letter book was discovered, as the Senator from Missouri says, by a fraudulent combination between this witness of his, Exall, and Granger, the whole subject came out, because there was the daily history of the operations of this mining company, recording every incident of that history which was at all material in its effect upon their present and future operations. It was the daily history of the company.

The book had been kept with great care. Every letter that was written on the ground was copy-pressed, and every letter that was written elsewhere by Exall or any other agent of that company was taken and pasted into the book and with its proper reference by pages was made a part of it. It was found, upon evidence that is not pretended here to be questioned, the evidence of Mr. De Lagnel, who the Senator from Missouri says is a witness accredited by both parties absolutely, that that letter book was complete in all of its parts; nothing had been added to it; it was a true copy of the letters that had been written.

Now, take that history and compare it with Exall's deposition when he propounded this claim and supposed that the book was lost, and there can not be any doubt in the world that he swore falsehoods from the very beginning line to the ending line of that deposition; that his testimony before the Mixed Commission was a total falsehood, violating the facts that he himself had recorded with his own hand in this book that he supposed then would never come to light. It came to light, and it utterly destroyed the whole of his testimony, and with the destruction of his testimony the case went all to pieces. There is nothing left in it out of which the most ingenious mind can build even a faint semblance of a claim against Mexico, after you have stricken out Exall's testimony.

The Senator from Missouri, with that ability for which he is so distinguished, attempted to escape the effect of this book upon Exall's testimony by saying that Exall and Granger had conspired together to do what? To rob the company out of its property; that while Exall was there managing it, finding that it was a very valuable piece of property, very rich, if he could break the company down by making continuous demands upon New York for the remittance of money, or if he could break it down by convincing the people in New York who were stockholders and managers of it that it was impossible, in the condition of public opinion and feeling in Mexico, to get along with the enterprise, finally he could cause them to abandon it, and once abandoned under the Spanish law, and it would be the same case under our laws, the next comer could take it as a forfeited or abandoned mine and pay nothing for it except to go and get authority from an alcalde to enter upon and possess himself of the mine. That is the theory the Senator from Missouri is now driven to advance in this case in order to convince the Senate that after all the President of the United States, aided by Mr. Evarts, his Secretary of State, came to an incorrect judgment when he announced that the honor of the United States and the principles of public law, and justice, and equity required that this award should be set aside.

Contrasting the two things together, contrasting this feeble attempt of the Senator from Missouri to patch up a case that is utterly destroyed by the testimony of his own witness, and the only witness who proves anything of value for him at all, with the action solemnly and deliberately taken by the President of the United States upon a full investigation of the whole transaction, what is the Senate left to do? Will it follow the Senator from Missouri in his imagination about this matter, or will it follow the declaration made by the President of the United States?

It has turned out that the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, after a most thorough investigation, contained here in this volume, which has 971 pages, a great deal of it very closely printed matter, have investigated this subject to the bottom. We come here and we claim that if Senators can point out in the action of that committee any defect, or if they can show that the conclusions are not well founded that they have reached independently of the action of the Presidents and of the Secretaries of State, it shall be done. Otherwise, in intrusting matters of this kind, of very great importance, magnitude, intricacy, and difficulty, into the hands of your committee, they are burdened with the responsibility of coming in here and occupying perhaps the residue of their terms if not their lives in efforts to meet objections which on their face apparently are merely captious.

When your committee make this report, unless it can be assailed by some Senator on this floor in some substantial manner, there is no use to ask committees hereafter to investigate these intricate matters which require such elaboration, for they will decline very respectfully to bestow the labor that is requisite upon a case of this kind when their report when made is received scarcely as prima facie evidence that they have looked into the subject at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any evidence to show a combination between Exall and Granger?

Mr. MORGAN. None in the world.

Mr. GEORGE. It is a mere surmise?

Mr. MORGAN. So far as I remember the testimony it is entirely a surmise; there is certainly no testimony to show a combination to injure the company in any way.

Now, Mr. President, after the committee has gotten through with this case, and the learned counsel and the numerous counsel, every one of whom has got part of the award in his pocket so far as assignment goes, in respect of every one of whom the payment of fees in the future depends entirely upon whether they can win this case before the Senate of the United States—after this great array of very eminent men had gotten through with this case, had surveyed the whole field, and had found that De Lagnel's testimony and other testimony in the case had utterly uprooted Exall's statement, they came forward with an affidavit which was prepared here at the time the treaty was pending in the Senate of the United States, which has such a curious history as expressed in itself and in some few facts stated in connection with it that I desire to read it, for this affidavit would of itself impeach Exall to such a degree that no just mind could attach the slightest importance to anything that he would swear to. He impeaches himself more thoroughly in this affidavit than I have ever known a witness to impeach himself by any transaction which has been differently purposed and executed.

Mr. GEORGE. Who made the affidavit—Exall?

Mr. MORGAN. Exall. That was while the treaty was pending here. It was sworn to May 1, 1878, or purports to have been sworn to then. Exall had gotten away from this mine. He had brought an action against the company for the services that he had rendered to them and recovered a judgment, and his main purpose at that time was to get money enough out of the company to pay his judgment. Other judgments also had been obtained against them that are yet unsatisfied. It is an insolvent corporation; and upon that feature of the case I shall make some observations after a little, I think. But the regular lawyer for this company got hold of him—the man who has kept his head just beneath the waves all the time, but has been the most operative man who has been conducting this business. Mr. Sumner Stow Ely got hold of Mr. Exall about that time and had him to make an affidavit which is one of the curiosities of jurisprudence and of literature also. It is in the form of a letter addressed to the La Abra Silver Mining Company.

TO LA ABRA SILVER MINING COMPANY:

My attention has been called by the attorney of your company to a statement that it is claimed by an agent of Mexico that certain letters written by and to me have been obtained by him which contain statements at variance with the depositions made by me in the matter of the claim of your company against Mexico, on which an award was made in your favor by Sir Edward Thornton, the umpire. I have not assented to the appropriation of my letters by any one, and if any of them are in the possession of such agent they have been improperly obtained. I have not seen those alleged letters, and can not say whether they are genuine, garbled, or wholly manufactured for some purpose.

But he had seen copies of them, for they had been printed by the Government of the United States; they were all through this committee; they were in the hands of every lawyer who had any connection with this case, and had been for a long time.

There were a number of letters written by me while in your employment and subsequently which, without explanation, may in part be considered as differing from my testimony. They were written between the early part of my administration of the affairs of your company in Mexico and a time some months after I ceased to be in your employ. The explanation of such parts of these letters as on their face seem to be inconsistent with my depositions will be found in the following facts:

I was sent from New York by the La Abra Silver Mining Company to Mexico to assist Col. J. A. De Lagnel, who was then superintendent of the works of the company in Tayoltita. When I reached Tayoltita I was accompanied by James Granger, an English subject. He was a fellow passenger on the steamers from New York to San Francisco. A few days after leaving the port of New York we became acquainted, and finally quite friendly and intimate, so much so that although his destination was California, much to my surprise when we arrived at San Francisco, he concluded to go down to Mexico with me, and did go with me to Tayoltita and remained at the company's hacienda as my guest until I (when I subsequently took charge of affairs and having found out that he was an expert man with books) gave him employment.

We had not been there many weeks before we concluded (for we frequently talked with each other on the subject) that the company, as a company, would not be tolerated long in Mexico; that it was a mere matter of time when they would be driven out and compelled to abandon and lose all their interests there (as other American enterprises there had been), and which would thus fall into the hands of some one who would get the benefit of all their works and a large amount of valuable ores which had cost the company large sums of money and much labor, and we conceived the idea of reaping the benefit ourselves.

We saw that if the company was actually expelled, as we were certain it ultimately would be, we might not, and most probably would not, be able to secure the property, as it would probably fall into other hands; but if the company could be induced voluntarily to abandon the property before matters culminated in an expulsion, or to part with it for a small consideration, we could probably retain the possession and secure the property to ourselves and due protection (Mr. Granger being an English subject).

The company was already somewhat disappointed because more rapid progress had not been made at the works and in reaching money results, and somewhat dissatisfied with being drawn on by the superintendent for more money. We thought that the state of affairs at the works could, from time to time, be so presented to the company as to induce the feeling we desired, and concluded to act accordingly. There was no purpose to wrong the company in any way; all we sought was to be enabled ourselves to get possession of the property and at the shortest possible time before the company would be driven out, which we believed was certain to be done, instead of permitting some one else, in that event, to obtain it.

Col. De Lagnel, the superintendent, was sick, and had become thoroughly disgusted with life at the mines; and the annoyance and obstructions to which he was subjected in Mexico worried him to such an extent that he felt, as he said, unfitted to properly attend to the business to be done, and he frequently asked me, during his administration, to take charge of affairs, which I did. And thus I indirectly had charge of the business of the company for some time before his departure, and I purposely made such reports to him as to the quantity and quality of the ores as would tend to give the color and tone to his letters written during the latter part of his administration to D. J. Garth, the treasurer of the company in New York.

When he left I became acting superintendent, and I retained Granger to assist me, as already stated. I conducted the business of the company the same as if I might be mistaken in my opinion that it would ultimately be driven out of Mexico, and did my utmost to improve and perfect its works, to get out ores and make its mines valuable. I obeyed the instructions of the company to my predecessor and myself and cut down all expenses, and to do so cut down the working force; but I endeavored to keep up production and the working of the mines by employing men to work by the carga.

That is, a sackful.

I expended every dollar of the company's money in its business, and notwithstanding its dissatisfaction at some drafts of my predecessor, I drew on the company for money for its business. Much of the bullion extracted by me was not minted, but was sent by me without the knowledge of any one at the hacienda but myself, some of it to New York, and some of it to San Francisco.

That is to say, he had stolen it; instead of mining it, he had stolen it and sent it off. He was a beautiful thief.

This secrecy was necessary because if it was known it would have been liable to seizure as contraband, and to avoid a possibility of a discovery of the facts no entry of it was ever made in the company's books, but the proceeds were put into the company's business as stated in my deposition.

In my letters to Mr. Garth, treasurer of the company, written from time to time, I purposely dwelt upon the exaggerated necessities and the exigencies of the situation, and belittled the value of the mines and ores, and gave to the letters a discouraging aspect. I also wrote to him about my arrest and the threats made to me, and the difficulties and obstructions generally which I met with from the Mexican authorities and people.

Mr. Garth wrote such answers to my letters as I assumed they would call forth, and from the answers it seemed evident that the company would not be unwilling to enter into some arrangement to part with their property; and in the latter part of February, 1868, I concluded to go on to New York and see what could be done to that end.

Preparatory to so going I drew a paper addressed to James Granger, which purported to invest him with my authority and to give him power to act for the company. I had no power to confer, being only an acting superintendent, nor authority to confer such power if I had any; but it was necessary for the purposes we had in view that he be in possession, and that he should seem to Mexicans to have the proper authority. Had I gone then I intended to return; but I reconsidered my decision to go at that time, and concluded I ought to remain longer before going, and await still more alarming indications from the people and authorities; and the paper I have referred to was never delivered to Granger. Whether I destroyed it or left it among the loose and discarded papers at the hacienda of the company I do not remember.

It was not necessary to show that Granger had any express authority from him to maintain the theory of this claim.

I remained there some time afterward, but I waited too long, and the explosion which I believed to be several months distant came unexpectedly, and the expulsion of the company, and my abrupt departure to save myself from personal harm, and the complete abandonment of everything belonging to the company, took place as I have stated in my deposition.

This expulsion satisfied me that the animosity of the authorities and people was not only against the company as an American company, but also against me as representative of an American company, and individually, and that even if I had got or could get possession of the property, I would not have been permitted to remain in the employment of it long, and I gave up all idea of returning for that purpose; but I hoped that Granger, instead of some Mexican, would get the possession of the property, and which I thought through his late affiliation with a Mexican family he might be enabled to do, and which he did as I learned, except that, as I am informed, Judge Soto, the father of his wife or mistress, took possession of and occupied the company's hacienda.

I returned to New York and informed the company of its expulsion, and of my forced abandonment of all its property and gave them a full history of the state of their affairs, and of the feeling in Mexico against them. The company seemed to think the case was hopeless.

A party who had heard of the company's mines proposed to get up a new company and buy out the La Abra Company; and believing that something might be saved to the company and made for myself, I exerted myself to bring it about, and even offered to accompany the party to Mexico to aid in completing the transaction, and I wrote several letters to Granger partly upon that subject, suggesting what course he should pursue, and endeavoring to prevent his throwing any obstacles in the way; but the party subsequently learned, through some channels, of the hostility of Mexicans to American companies and of the actual expulsion from the country of the La Abra Company, and he dropped all negotiations on the subject, and nothing ever after came of it.

I speak of my letters from general recollection of them only, but the foregoing is a correct history of the origin and purpose of all letters I have ever written which contain anything inconsistent with my depositions—they were written for the express purpose of enabling Granger and myself to obtain the possession of the company's works and mines in the contingency which I have mentioned, and were known to and largely prompted by Granger, and in fact partly drafted by him, and in so for as they conflict with my depositions, the letters are untrue, and every material statement in my depositions is true.

CHARLES H. EXALL.

NEW YORK, April 23, 1878.

I will not argue to this body upon that state of the case. Perhaps if I were arguing the case before a justice of the peace or a greenhorn jury, I might dwell a little upon these facts, but I take it for granted that every Senator here and every member of Congress who ever reads this portion of the case will perfectly understand that a case which rested upon testimony of a self-impeached witness like that can have no consideration in the estimate that an honest and sincere government would form of it when it has a duty to perform in respect of a sister country or in respect of one of its own citizens.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

The lawyer who offered this paper—

Q. Please state who it was that drew the statement which has just been read to the committee; the one sworn to by Exall?

Says Mr. Ely, the witness:

A. Mr. Exall himself. It was in his handwriting.

Q. If you had any part in the preparation of the statement will you please state fully to the committee just what that part was?

A. I drew the affidavit at the foot of it—

You observe it is a letter addressed to La Abra Mining Company—and when he brought me the statement it was addressed to me as the attorney of the company. I suggested that he should address it to La Abra Company itself, which necessitated a change in some part of the phraseology of the first two or three lines, which he made, and also I suggested the transposition of some paragraphs. The order—it struck me as I read it—it struck me it would be more consecutive if he would change the location of some paragraphs, and I suggested that. That is the only part or lot I had with it.

Q. Please state in whose handwriting the original affidavit—the statement which you have described was written.

A. The statement signed by him was in his handwriting. The affidavit at the end was in mine.

Q. Well, I speak of the affidavit. I mean the statement that was sworn to, and my question is in whose handwriting the sworn statement was?

A. Mr. Exall's.

Q. How long was it after that that Exall died?

A. I do not know the exact date of his death, but I think it was in the fall or winter of the same year.

Mr. KENNEDY. If you have no questions to ask the witness, Mr. Chairman, I will pass to another point.

The CHAIRMAN. No; conclude the examination about this. Put it together, so that if it goes out on the record it must go out bodily, and if it goes in it can go in bodily. Gen. Foster, have you any questions to put about this matter?

Mr. FOSTER. None.

By the CHAIRMAN:

I wish to ask him a question or two now. How long after Exall's return to New York was it that this affidavit was written?

A. Well, sir, I should think it was ten years.

Ten years; written at the time when the treaty was pending in the Senate.

Q. Ten years after his return from Mexico?

A. I think he returned from Mexico in about 1868, and this was in 1878, which would be ten years.

Q. What had he been engaged in during that period of ten years?

A. I could not answer as to that; what he did quite a number of the years after he came back, I don't know. The latter part of the time he was clerk or cashier in one or more of the bankers' and brokers' houses there in the city.

Q. Was he during any part of that time conducting business on his own account?

A. Not that I am aware of. I never knew of it.

Q. Did you see him frequently during that interval of ten years?

A. No, sir; not the first part of it, and I doubt very much whether he was in the city of New York. The latter part of it I saw him occasionally; happened to run across him.

Q. Were you the agent and attorney of the company at the time he returned from Mexico?

A. I was the attorney of the company.

Q. Did you have any other official connection with it?

A. None whatever.

Q. Who was the secretary and treasurer of the company at the time of his return?

A. Well, I think Mr. Worthington was the secretary and Mr. D. J. Garth was the treasurer; that is my recollection about it. I have no official information about it.

Q. At what time was the business of the company passed into your hands as trustee?

A. It never passed into my hands except as only one of the trustees.

Q. Were you ever the treasurer and secretary?

A. Yes.

Q. When did that occur?

A. In 1876 I became secretary and then treasurer; not, however, at the same time. I became treasurer in 1877 or 1878.

Q. When did you receive the first installment of money on the award for this company?

A. I think it was in the fall of 1879.

Q. After Exall's return from Mexico did he have any dispute or controversy with the company about his salary out there?

A. Well, I have an impression that he and Mr. Garth had some disagreement about it.

Now, that lawyer prepared the defense in the case in which Exall brought the suit.

Q. Do you know whether it was paid?

A. No, I do not; but I knew, in a general way, that they had arranged their disagreement.

Q. How much did he receive?

A. I do not know, sir; know nothing about it; had nothing to do with the adjustment of it.

Q. Have you ever seen any record or paper of the company that showed the settlement with Exall?

A. No, sir; I have no recollection of any.

Q. Have you any papers of this company now in your possession?

A. I have some that came into my possession since I became secretary and treasurer myself, in the year 1876.

Q. What is the character of these papers?

A. Well, the records which I have kept, and the books which I have made.

Q. Do those records contain any evidence of a settlement with Exall?

A. No, sir; I am sure they do not.

Q. Did Exall sue the company for his salary?

A. I don't think he did, but I would not be positive about that. It is barely possible he might have caused a summons to be served on them, or something of that kind; but if there had been a litigated suit it would have fallen into my hands, and there was nothing of that kind.

Q. How much stock have you got in this company?

A. I have one share transferred to me nominally to qualify me to act.

Q. How much of the proceeds of this award has been assigned or transferred to you?

A. Not a dollar.

The Secretary of State says there are assignments there for $30,000, as I remember the figures.

Q. How much has been agreed to be assigned or transferred to you?

A. Not a dollar.

Q. Have you no contingent or conditional interest in the recovery of this award?

A. I have what I think you might call contingent interest in the affairs of the company, not directly contingent by virtue of any arrangement, but contingent by force of the situation.

Q. Your agreement with the company is not a conditional or contingent employment?

A. No, sir.

Q. For a sum certain?

A. No, sir; it is not for any sum certain. I have no agreement with the company, but any services I can render do not give me any interest in the award—are not dependent upon that at all. What my services in the affair are worth I expect they will pay.

Q. Mr. Baldwin has testified to some money having been paid you out of this award.

A. Yes.

Q. How much was that?

A. Paid to me out of this award? I think $10,000.

Q. When was that paid?

A. That was paid to me in 1879, I think.

Q. Did you have a conference with Mr. Exall before he wrote this affidavit that you say was in his handwriting originally?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was it an extended conference?
A. I went to his house in the evening. It lasted an hour or so.
Q. Did you have then any copies of the letters that he was said to have written to the company from Mexico?
A. I had made memoranda from the little phamphlet that I had put in my hands here, but which I left behind me here. I had jotted down the dates of some of the letters, and to and from whom, and some expressions in them. I told him the contents of those letters, as well as I could, and gave him the data I had.
Q. And it was upon your statement to him that he predicated this affidavit in explanation of these letters?
A. Yes, sir; my statement of the appearance of these letters here and what they contained, as nearly as I could state to him, and the memoranda I had made of the letters predicated that.
Q. At what place was this affidavit prepared?
A. I can not tell at what place he drew it. He may have drawn it at his place of business. My conference with him was at his room in East Twelfth street.
Q. How long was it after this that he appeared with this letter that he swears to?
A. This statement?
Q. Yes.
A. Well, I should think three or four days. It was not the next day, I know. A few days elapsed.
Q. Was anything pending before the Senate or House of Representatives at that time relating to this award.
A. Yes.
Q. What was it?
A. It was the bill which subsequently became the law of June 10, 1878, for the distribution of the moneys from this award.
Q. Now, was any committee of Congress in charge of that measure at that time?
A. I think it had been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House.

I made one mistake about a date here. At the time the law we are now trying to execute was enacted the Houses of Congress took up this subject very vigorously and investigated it, and this same question was raised then about the authenticity of these letters, and it became necessary for Exall to get rid of them; and so it was at that time that the affidavit was prepared. It was prepared for use before the Houses of Congress on that occasion; but subsequently when the treaty came up for ratification in the Senate, Exall then being dead, a copy of this affidavit was presented to the Senate of the United States, and then finally brought before the committee of which I am a member.

Q. Who was then chairman of that committee?
A. I think it was a member from Maryland; I think Mr. Swann, I think, was chairman of the committee.
Q. Was any investigation being conducted by that committee in respect of this claim?
A. I think a subcommittee of that committee; yes, sir.

I will say right here, Mr. President, that with all the labor which has been bestowed upon this case there is scarcely as much of perspicuity or perspicacity now in the different statements and reports made as there was then, and no very great amount of addition to the facts known. That committee, in the passage of this law that we are trying to execute now, fully and completely understood the whole case, and Congress never acted more intelligently or more wisely or upon stronger proof than it did when it passed the law of 1878.

Q. Were they examining witnesses?
A. No; I don't think they took any examination of witnesses, but it was mainly arguments of counsel.
Q. Did you take this affidavit of Exall's before that committee?
A. No, sir.
Q. Why not?
A. Because it was drawn with a view to meeting Slaughter's petition, and that petition was never presented, and I think that the subcommittee had made its report; reported the bill and finished its business; reported it to the House.
Q. Is that petition anywhere in this record?
A. Of Slaughter's, no, sir; I think not.

It is, however, not a petition, but his affidavit, his statement.

Q. Are you certain that the petition never went before the committee or subcommittee of the House of Representatives?
A. I have never seen that it did; never saw any record that it did, and understood at the time from people who were conversant with the mode of proceeding that it never was presented. It was circulated rather privately among the members, and one of them fell into the hands of Mr. Bartholow, who showed it to me.
Q. At the time you had this consultation, or conference, with Exall about the letters that he had written from Tayoltita, was this double-column statement of the Mexican case in existence?
A. Not to my knowledge.
Q. You don't know whether it had then been presented to the State Department?
A. I don't know anything about that. It was not then known to me.
Q. Was the pamphlet of Slaughter the only allusion that you knew of to letters that purported to come from Exall?
A. The first and only one.
Q. Why did you make a copy of this affidavit?
A. This here?
Q. Yes.
A. Because I desired to keep a copy of it.
Q. When did you make it?
A. One or two days before it was filed here.
Q. In 1882?
A. In 1882.
Q. You stated, if I understood you, that you presented that affidavit at that time because you understood that a treaty with Mexico was then pending before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations?
A. I understood so.
Q. And you handed it to Mr. Pendleton; Mr. Shellabarger handed it to Mr. Pendleton in your presence?
A. He went inside. I did not see to whom he handed it. I staid outside the door, and Mr. Shellabarger just stepped in. Mr. Shellabarger can speak on that point.
Q. Was Exall living at that time?
A. No, sir. He died, I think, in the latter part of 1878.
Q. But he was living at the time that this first investigation was going on in the House of Representatives?
A. He was living at that time; yes, sir. Before that committee reported the bill, and at the time that the committee reported the bill, he was living.
Q. Well, was there any reason why you did not present Mr. Exall to that committee, and have him examined?
A. We did not know anything about those letters until after that committee made its report and this bill was in the House of Representatives.
Q. That bill then came over to the Senate, did it not?
A. I think it originated in the House.
Q. And then came to the Senate?
A. I think that one was introduced in the Senate, too, at the same time.
Q. Was there any investigation in the Senate of the facts and circumstances?
A. Not that I ever knew.
Q. Well, did these letters of Exall, in printed form or in any form, come before the committee of either House prior to the passage of the act of Congress to which you refer, distributing this award?
A. Not to my knowledge. I should feel quite confident in saying they had not, but I have no knowledge of it, however.
Q. Now, I will get you to state your best recollection of what it was you told Mr. Exall those letters contained.
A. At the time when he made the statement? Well, sir, I can not give you the dates of the letters, but I told him in a general way that those letters contained statements that the ores were not valuable.
Q. Let me ask you, did you only make a statement to him in a general way or did you make specific statements?
A. No; I did not pretend to make specific statements.
Q. Well, awhile ago you said you copied out parts of the letters?
A. I copied out some expressions.
Q. Well, what I wish is a statement of your best recollection of all you said to Exall in respect to those letters—the whole of it. Just go right through now and state it in your own way.
A. I stated to him that there appeared to be certain letters from him written to Mr. Garth as treasurer of the company, and that those letters contained statements in them that the ores at the mines in Mexico were of little value; that there had been no trouble down there with the authorities; that he had been embarrassed for want of funds—well, I can not give you it in much more specific form than that. The general upshot of it was that the company was without valuable property down there, and that his letters tended to show it; and that they were without means down there, and that his letters tended to show that; and that there was no difficulty with the people about titles or anything else of that kind, or any abandonment; that he had written to Mr. Garth that if he did not intend to let the property go to the dogs down there he must send some money. I can not remember all I said, nor give you now anything nearer to it than that; that I certainly said to him the statements in those letters, if those letters were written by him and the statements were true, conflicted with the statements that he made in his depositions for the company, and that if those were his letters and the statements were true I wanted to know it, and that if they were not true I wanted him to tell me what his explanation of them was, if they were his letters. That is as near as I can now tell you, Mr. Senator, about this. I have no doubt that I gave him something more, particularly of the expressions in the letters, but I conveyed to him the impression as strongly as I could that those letters, in my opinion, went counter to his affidavits, and I wanted to know what the truth was about them."

That will give you a sample of this testimony; and they go on with it. In various forms he expresses that same statement, that he informed Exall if these letters were not wiped out by his affidavit they simply destroyed the case.

These claimants in their desperation to get the case through that committee came in there and undertook to impeach their own witness with a view of making his subsequent ex parte affidavit, evidently paid for by this counsel of the company for his wages, overturn the series of letters written at the time by him and Granger and others acting in concert, giving to this company in every material and particular respect that any person could possibly demand an exact history of the proceedings of the company.

Mr. GEORGE. Has Granger been examined?

Mr. MORGAN. Granger is dead. I am not so sure about his evidence having been obtained, but I will find out. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] prepared the report in the case. My recollection now is that Granger was not sworn. I think I can tell in a moment. I do not think he was sworn. Granger remained out in Mexico with his Mexican wife that he married there. He never came back to the United States. My recollection now is that they never got hold of him to swear him. It is probably a pity they did not.

Mr. GEORGE. He was not examined before the Commission?

Mr. MORGAN. No; he died long before the committee took testimony.

Mr. GEORGE. He was not examined before the Joint Commission?

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I was trying to find out. I do not think he was. He was not examined before the committee of the Senate. He was dead long before the committee investigated the matter.

Mr. COKE. It is stated in the testimony that he never returned to the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, he never returned to the United States; but I did not know but that his deposition or affidavit might have been taken in Mexico. However, I do not remember that it was, and I do not believe it was. I can find out from the record before I get through with my remarks.

That case is so awfully voluminous and there is so very much of it that it is almost impossible to condense a statement of it in such a form as to satisfy the Senate as to what the real state of facts is through and through. If I were before a jury trying this cause upon the facts, in order to do justice to my clients I should have to spend fully a week in the investigation of the testimony. I can not do it here. I do not wish to do it. I do not think it is necessary; I do not think it is proper; I do not think it is required of the committee. I do not suppose you wanted us to come here prepared to satisfy every Senator who might ask a question about any feature of this case so as to convince him that we were right in our conclusions about it.

Now, Mr. President, so far as the facts of this case are concerned, what I have just stated to the Senate, what the Senator from Oregon has so elaborately argued, must stand as our statement in respect of the La Abra case. I have given a portion of the history of the case, with the proceedings before the Commission, which applies equally to the La Abra case and to the Weil case. The law that has been insisted and relied upon here applies equally to both cases, so that we can argue them conjointly until we come to the question as to whether the facts differ and whether the facts in each case are equally sufficient and conclusive to support the recommendations of the committee and to support also the action of the Presidents of the United States who have examined this subject and have reported their conclusions to Congress and the country.

A question was raised by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, which, coming from a gentleman of so much eminence, and one holding so high a judicial position with relation to the Senate of the United States, would alarm me, in respect of the propriety of that section of the bill which he proposes to strike out, if it were not that I happen to be fortified by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in such a way that it seems to me impossible to doubt that the committee is on safe ground in the recommendation of the third section of the bill.

The third section of the bill relates to the right of appeal from this decision, and while I concede that it is really not a matter of very material consequence, and never will be a matter of material consequence, probably to the claimants in this case, nevertheless I hold to the idea that when we have appellate tribunals and parties have cases that would, according to the amount, the principles, and questions involved, fall within the jurisdiction of those appellate tribunals, it is always the duty of the legislative power to give to any man concerned in a controversy or a litigation the benefit of an appeal. I regret that I feel impelled to ask the Senate to hold on to this right of appeal, for I do not wish that this case shall go out of the Congress of the United States with the slightest impeachment upon it.

I wish that none of these men may be able to say hereafter that we have violated any principle or usage of law in the disposal of this matter, but that it may be said that the Government of the United States has offered to these men, whom it has lately found itself compelled to bring into court, a full, fair, and impartial trial before a proper judicial tribunal of the country, and has given to the parties litigant all the full rights of appeal that would belong to a litigation between private individuals. So I prefer to hold on to that section of the bill.

The question is whether an appeal will lie in such a case. I did not comprehend the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts. He seemed to regard this bill not as the creation of a judicial authority in the Court of Claims, the conferring of a new jurisdiction to decide a matter in controversy as a matter of fact between parties, but to decide upon a principle, the principle which he characterizes, and it is so characterized in the legislation which we are trying to execute here, as a moral principle and also as an equitable principle. But when a moral principle or an equitable principle is placed within the jurisdiction of a court, upon the court's finding the existence of a certain state of facts, then jurisdiction is conferred, and the court may go on and pronounce judgment. That is the way we get jurisdiction. The political power, as it is called, confers upon the judicial power of the country the right to hear and determine certain questions.

The Senator seemed to suppose that it was necessary that such a case should be made as that one of the parties would in contemplation of law ordinarily be entitled to the assistance of a court as against the other. That is not the correct view of the law of this land or of our juridical system. In the clause of the Constitution of the United States which confers jurisdiction, the second section of the third article, we have the following:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity—

Now, a case in law and equity may be really framed and made by a statute as well as it may exist in contemplation of the common law and the rules of equity under the common-law practice independent of any statute—arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority—

This case arises under a treaty. It involves the construction of a treaty. The Supreme Court of the United States have twice taken jurisdiction of this case on appeal upon motions for mandamus in an inferior court, and they have done it not merely in view of a right of supervision over inferior tribunals (for that is not the ground of their jurisdiction—it never was), but they have done it in virtue of the fact that it was a case that arose under the laws and treaties of the United States. So I might conclude that the two cases of Weil vs. Frelinghuysen and Boynton vs. Blaine were in themselves from the very necessity of the case decisions, and that the Supreme Court of the United States had a right to exercise appellate jurisdiction over questions which arise under this treaty and under the laws of the United States—to all cases affecting ambassadors, * * * to controversies to which the United States shall be a party.

That means, of course, to controversies to which the United States by law shall become a party or in natural right and justice would be a party, as when the United States was claiming to hold a certain piece of property under a title or claiming damages against somebody for the breach of a bond or something like that, in such cases the jurisdiction and power would arise out of the law which relegated the controversy to which the United States could be made a party in consequence of the statute to the adjudication of the court.

This annotator—I read from Paschal's Annotated Constitution, and it is a very good book—says:

199. Judicial power, as contradistinguished from legislative power and executive power, is the power to hear and determine all the cases of law and fact which arise between the Government and parties or between parties under this Constitution, the law of nations, and the laws and treaties of the United States which shall be legally brought within the cognizance and jurisdiction of any of the courts or judicial tribunals established under the Constitution. It was intended to be a separate department of the Government, possessing all the "judicial power" of the National Government except upon the single jurisdiction of impeachment.

He goes on then to comment on cases arising under treaties and cites a number of authorities, which I will not burden the RECORD by putting in, but they are all apt. I have examined, I think, every one of them. This writer says:

A case arises, within the meaning of the Constitution, whenever any question respecting the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States has assumed such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting on it. Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wh., 819; Jones v. Seward, 41 Barb., 272; Curtis's Com., § 7; Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wallace, 112, 114.

204. "Controversies to which the United States shall be a party"—

1. The jurisdiction is not conferred upon any particular court; Congress must therefore designate the tribunal—

For the settlement of controversies.

2. Cognizance is not given of all controversies, but only of some.

3. "Controversies" seem to embrace only civil suits. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 411, 412; Story's Const., § 1674-1681; Curtis's Com., § 56, 57.

The United States can only be sued in cases where it has consented to be sued by act of Congress—Curtis's Com., § 57; Story's Const., § 1677, 1678—as in suits for the confirmation of land grants and in the Court of Claims. Curtis's Com., § 100-102.

A suit against the President to prevent the enforcement of the reconstruction laws was held to be a suit against the Executive of the United States, and dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall., 498; Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall., 100.

In the enactment of our laws establishing a Court of Claims, Congress had all of this law under its immediate examination, and made the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, in conformity to the existing decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and well-recognized principles of constitutional and other law. Section 12 provides:

That when any claim or matter may be pending in any of the Executive Departments which involves controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department, with the consent of the claimant, may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall report its findings to the Department by which it was transmitted.

There is a case provided for where a controversy is pending before it becomes a case, a claim that is not a case and can not be made a case under any existing law, which can only become a case after we have passed a law giving a court jurisdiction and authorized the United States to sue or compel the other party to sue, or in default thereof to be debarred of his right. When a matter of that kind is depending in any of the Executive Departments of the Government, then by the consent of the parties that case can be transferred to the Court of Claims, together with all documents appertaining thereto, and the judgment that the Court of Claims is to render upon it is as follows:

When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall report its findings to the Department by which it was transmitted.

Now, under section 9—

That the plaintiff or the United States, in any suit brought under the provisions of this act shall have the same rights of appeal or writ of error as are now reserved in the statutes of the United States in that behalf made, and upon the conditions and limitations therein contained. The modes of procedure in claiming and perfecting an appeal or writ of error shall conform in all respects, and as near as may be, to the statutes and rules of court governing appeals and writs of error in like causes.

There is a controversy pending before an Executive Department referred by this statute, with the consent of the defendant, to the Court of Claims. That court finds the facts and the law, and returns its report to the Department. That report is made expressly appealable by the ninth section of the act which I have just read.

If the Supreme Court of the United States can take jurisdiction of an appeal under such a law as that, it certainly can under the law proposed in this bill; there can not be a question of it. In both these causes the defendant's consent has been sought, that they would comply with this statute and send the cause to the Court of Claims. They said: "No; we stand upon our rights—our technical rights. We stand upon rights that we think we can enforce by mandamus. We do not want to have the merits of this case investigated by any court. We likewise object to any law that approaches a consideration of the merits of this controversy; we will not consent."

The brief and argument and long protestation which Mr. Bayard sends in and his letter are in the books now, detailing the whole affair. Now, says this bill, inasmuch as you had twice tendered to you, and your course is one of continual delay and obstruction, and inasmuch as you will not bring a suit against the United States or consent to have the controversy relegated to the Court of Claims, we will compel the United States to sue you, make it the plaintiff in the action—to do what? To get rid of a false award which binds the United States in some sense; perhaps in conscience, perhaps in honor, perhaps in justice, perhaps in equity; but we will instruct the Attorney-General of the United States to bring a suit against you. If I had the title to a tract of land, or believed I had, and was in the occupancy of it, and I found a lot of people going around setting up a title to this land and making claims to it and embarrassing my title by the assertion of this claim and that and the other to it, although in my bill when I filed it, I would not assert that any one of those claims was valid; I would ask the investigation of a court of equity to remove the cloud from my title, to quiet my title, and by injunction to stop these people from setting up their fraudulent claim. That is the nature of the jurisdiction here.

These claimants come forward in every form that they can and worry and continue to insist upon these claims in the hope that after awhile the Congress of the United States and its authorities will get tired, and that some Secretary may do as some have done, really violate the statutes of the United States in order to pay the money into their hands Their chance for getting this money does not depend upon the validity of the claim when it was proven nor does it depend upon their ability to prove it now, but simply by exhausting the efforts of the Government to do justice in this matter and to prevent them from insisting upon an unlawful claim, stand by and let time elapse, the more the better. The money is there; it is in reach; the glittering hoard is a temptation to the hundreds and hundreds who in one way or another got themselves connected, as I will show after a little, with this matter. If they can all agree to delay and obstruct, after a while the authorities of the Government of the United States, forgetting the honor of the country, and the duty they owe to its protection, pretermit their efforts to have this money put in the right direction, and these men will stuff it in their corrupt pockets. There is the situation.

I propose, in behalf of the United States Government and in the execution of what Congress determined in the passage of that act of 1878, that the Congress of the United States shall otherwise provide, and I think that the other provision which is proposed here now is a valid one in every possible respect; certainly it is necessary unless the Congress of the United States makes up its mind that it will permit itself to be worried out of patience to such an extent as that these men shall finally triumph in their fraud by the lapse of time and through the assistance of obstruction reap the golden harvest that springs from the corrupt seed of their perjury.

Mr. GEORGE. Will it disturb the Senator from Alabama if I interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. I have listened with some attention to what the Senator has said with reference to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I am sorry to say whilst the argument of the Senator is able and clear, yet it does not reach the exact difficulty in my mind. Now, if it would not disturb the Senator I should like to state to him the difficulty which I have.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be glad to hear it, because I can answer it now as well as any time if I can answer it at all.

Mr. GEORGE. In reference to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, this bill provides for a suit nominally between the United States and the La Abra Company and its assigns. The United States is the complainant; the company and its assigns are the defendants. That makes a case in court. But then it does not provide for a trial and final decision, and the rendition of a judgment in favor of the United States against the La Abra Company according to law.

The object of the bill seems to be to authorize the United States in a nominal suit, in which the United States are the complainants and this company and its assigns are the defendants, to ascertain whether a certain state of facts exists, no power being given to render a judgment against the La Abra Company or its assigns, but simply for the determination of the question as to whether these facts exist as stated. That is the nature of the suit. That is not, in my judgment, such a suit as the Supreme Court can take jurisdiction of.

Then, again, this very great difficulty arises in the case, treating it as a suit, as it professes to be, between the United States and the La Abra Company. In a suit of that sort we have no right to prescribe in the statute which authorizes the bringing of the suit a different rule of law to ascertain or fix the liability of the defendant other than that which existed when the transaction took place. This bill provides for the ascertainment of what may be just and equitable, what in good conscience and equity ought to be done.

As was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day, the word "equity" or "equitable" as used in this statute, does not describe what we lawyers understand by the technical term "equity" as enforced in the chancery courts. You can not enforce in a suit any obligation unless it be a legal obligation or unless it be an equitable obligation; one which by the rules of equity, as expounded by the courts, the defendant owes.

As I understand the object of this bill, it is to give relief if a state of facts is ascertained to exist, which in equity in another sense, in the sense of good faith, and honor, and proper dealing between parties, in the sense in which a government ought in its dealings with other people to be bound by, would justify such relief.

Now, I would suggest to the Senator that there is another difficulty in the matter. If this court should find that according to the rules of morality, or that equity which is founded on morality and not on equitable obligations as enforced in the courts of equity—if this court should find that according to the rules of honor and morality the Government of the United States ought to pay, that does not authorize the rendition of a judgment against the defendants in this case, because that transaction having transpired fully, the obligations of the defendants and the rights of the United States, so far as a court can take cognizance of them, depend upon the rules of law and equity as contradistinguished from mere morality, as they existed at the time the transaction took place.

If we intend that this case shall be settled not according to the rules of equitable jurisprudence, but according to the rules of equity as we understand it as characterizing the relations and conduct between man and man; if it is to be decided upon that last ground, then the Supreme Court of the United States can not take jurisdiction, because we refer to the court not a legal, not an equitable obligation, but an obligation arising purely in foro conscientiæ, a matter of conscience and of honor, which can never be referred by an act of Congress to a judicial tribunal. That is the difficulty which I have.

The object of the bill is, in a suit to be brought between the United States and the La Abra Company, to ascertain a certain state of facts, which state of facts may exist without imposing upon the defendant an obligation which can be enforced by a court of law to make any restitution, but which in our judgment, if ascertained to exist, makes it obligatory upon the United States in honor and in justice to make restitution. That is the trouble I have. The Supreme Court will never decide that; it will never take jurisdiction, I fear, to decide any such question.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Alabama, I merely desire to say that it is not possible for us to provide that the Supreme Court shall have any jurisdiction in this case which did not exist at the time it arose.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. I admit we can provide new remedies, but I deny that we can change the law so that the obligations of the parties at the time the transactions took place shall be increased.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me in a single sentence to give an illustration of the doctrine which I endeavered to make out the other day. The Senator from Mississippi has stated to-day——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. How much time does the Senator desire to take?

Mr. HOAR. Very little; but if the Senator does not desire to be interrupted I shall wait.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose there were a case where there were very strong reasons why the Government of the United States ought to waive the statute of limitations in a cause pending in the Court of Claims, any cause which may be brought, and suppose we should enact that the case might be referred to the Court of Claims with an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to find the facts, and on those facts to determine whether the United States ought, in equity and good conscience, to waive the statute of limitations if they thought that would give a remedy. That would be an illustration of what I took occasion in substance to give of a case where we can not confer on the court that power.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts must have been on the Committee on the Judiciary in 1887.

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Here is a law we passed at that time, and I want to know what the Senator meant by that law. We then had been in a controversy and I read it, and I now want to read it to the Senator so that he may explain it to me if I misunderstand it. I will read first section 9:

SEC. 9. That the plaintiff or the United States, in any suit brought under the provisions of this act shall have the same rights of appeal or writ of error as are now reserved in the statutes of the United States in that behalf made, and upon the conditions and limitations therein contained. The modes of procedure in claiming and perfecting an appeal or writ of error shall conform in all respects, and as near as may be, to the statutes and rules of court governing appeals and writs of error in like causes.

I will read, in section 12, one of those cases in which this right of appeal exists:

SEC. 12. That when any claim or matter may be pending in any of the Executive Departments which involves controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department, with the consent of the claimant, may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall report its findings to the Department by which it was transmitted.

That is the only judgment in the case. Of course we can not confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of the United States by consent, but with the consent of the parties to this provision of section 12 we can get the parties in a case into which a controversy has resolved itself before the Court of Claims, one of our regular courts, and from that an appeal will lie.

Mr. HOAR. That is the very point. There is no appeal from that.

Mr. MORGAN. Section 9 says that in any suit brought under the provisions of this act the plaintiff "shall have the right of appeal."

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I have not had the opportunity of refreshing my recollection in regard to that act, although I had a good deal to do with that act, and drew one or more of its sections. What the Senator has just read refers to a suit brought under the act.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; it is a suit brought under the provisions of the act.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. MORGAN. Just a moment. The Senator will not object if I decline to yield to him, as he did a few moments ago.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, that is right. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to get at the root of this thing.

Mr. MORGAN. The controversy may be pending in one of the Executive Departments, consisting of either law or fact. That question of law or that question of fact, whichever it may be, or it may be both, by the consent of the parties to the controversy may be placed within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and that court shall render its decision both upon the law and the facts, or upon either, according to the nature of the case.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not disputing the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. Now, then, any suit under this act, says section 9——

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is all right.

Mr. MORGAN. Section 9 says that any suit under this act shall be appealable. So when the jurisdiction is conferred, although the judgment may not in itself be final in that sense in which judgments were compelled to be final at law or in equity in order to sustain the appellate jurisdiction of a court of appellate powers—although the judgment may not be final, the reason for introducing this into the statute is simply this: Our Constitution gives in express words to the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction by appeal of controversies which have not become cases—"controversies"—and it was necessary to so arrange and modify the statute laws of the United States that that appellate power given to the Supreme Court of the United States might be exercised in controversies where there was nothing decided except the question of law or the question of fact, and where no money demand was ascertained at all, and where afterwards it might become or might not become the duty of the chief of the Executive Department to respond in money according to the principles and facts there declared.

Senators have overlooked the fact that the higher appellate courts in Great Britain, from which we have derived a great deal of our appellate system, did not have jurisdiction of controversies at common law except under some special statute. I use the term "common law" in its application to equity courts and law courts. At common law to sustain an appeal there must be a final judgment. That is the old common-law rule. You do not see it in the Constitution of the United States. No mention is made of it there, and yet the Supreme Court in a suit between myself and any other person would say, whether it is a suit at law or a suit in equity, that according to the principles of the common law there must be a final decision of the case. But where the Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction of controversies, where the United States is a party, or where jurisdiction depends not upon the nature of the controversy, but the mere residence of the controverters, here is a new power conferred upon our courts under the Constitution of the United States, and we have a perfect right to make available to any litigant who, pursuant to the statute, has a controverted case in law. That is the law of this case.

Now, Mr. President, I propose, inasmuch as this case has brought up this new question here, to go a little into some authorities about it. I want to read now——

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the Senator from Alabama will understand that I am not disputing the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. That is a legislative court, and we can give it any jurisdiction we see proper, but the Supreme Court, being a constitutional court, is without jurisdiction unless conferred by the Constitution.

Mr. MORGAN. The Constitution—I will read it again, and I am sure that I shall not offend the Senator from Mississippi by reading it, although I expect he has read it a thousand times, and spent sleepless nights in thinking it over——

Mr. GEORGE. It can not be read too often.

Mr. MORGAN. The Constitution says:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising—

How?—

arising under this Constitution—

That is not a common-law jurisdiction—

the laws of the United States—

That is not the common law—and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority—

It does not say to all cases that are finally decided or in which the court renders a money judgment, but it means cases arising under the Constitution for its exposition and under a treaty for its exposition and under a law of the United States for its exposition where you get the case in proper shape to make the United States Government a party to it. Now, then—to controversies to which the United States shall be a party.

What kind of a controversy? Why, it is not even a case; it is not a suit in which money is involved or property is involved, but it is a "controversy" pending, to which the United States is a party, as if the United States holds in its hands a trust fund and some one proposes to set up an equitable or moral right, as, for instance, under the doctrine of cy pres if one eleemosynary demand be made by an institution not named in the will or the deed, it being almost exactly in conformity with the wishes of the testator and the purpose of his devise, sometimes you can go into a court of chancery not with the right, not with the declaration of admitted right, but you go in under the doctrine of cy pres, to have yourself substituted for the benefits of the trust in order that the testator's will may be executed. That would be more nearly like a controversy than any case which at present occurs to my mind respecting the rights of private individuals. But when we come to a Government organized like ours is, where questions arise between individuals and States, which ought to be determined, instead of leaving them to the prerogative of the crown or to some ancient precedents to be dug out of the records of obscurity, we provide in our free and liberal Constitution a jurisdiction for the decision of controversies to which the Government of the United States is a party, broad and plenary and undeniable.

Mr. GEORGE. In which no legal or equitable rights are involved?

Mr. MORGAN. It does not say so. If the Senator from Mississippi wishes to construe the Constitution so as to mean controversies involving a sum of $5,000, or more than that——

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. MORGAN. If you do not you are gone up, if you will allow the expression. Or would the Senator confine it to controversies involving a money judgment, controversies involving a restoration of title to property? The committee, of which the Senator from Massachusetts was so long a distinguished member and is now chairman, found no difficulty at all in using the powers of legislation to give to the parties by their consent the right to go into the Court of Claims and thence to the United States Supreme Court on this basis, that the Supreme Court, the judicial power of the United States, shall extend to controversies to which the United States shall be a party.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like at some time when it is convenient to the Senator to call his attention to an error of his. I do not understand that this statute——

Mr. MORGAN. We shall see about that after awhile.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. If I misunderstand that, there will not be any error in misunderstanding the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOAR. I think the same error will not occur again.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think it would happen now. I think the error is in the Senator misconstruing or construing too narrowly his own wise provisions for the benefit of the people of the United States. But, sir, I deny the doctrine, I deny the proposition that it is necessary in order to give to the Supreme Court of the United States an appellate jurisdiction that there should be a judgment in dollars and cents, or a judgment of property in respect of the title of property, affirming or disaffirming it. It never was intended to limit the right of appeal to judgments that are simply called final at common law, either in equity or at law. It was intended to given a broader jurisdiction; otherwise you could not make that provision of the Constitution read.

A "controversy" is not "a case." We understand exactly what a "case" is. It is a suit between individuals, or, if you please, a suit between the Government and individuals, in which a demand is made for a certain specific remedy, which is given or refused according to the judgment of the court. When it gets into that shape and the parties litigatant are brought before the tribunal, then we have got a case. Prior to that time there is no case, but it is a controversy.

What sort of a nebulous thing have we here that no man can define in the law and give the court the power to try or decide? Are we unable by a statute of ours to exercise a power to which the Federal jurisdiction is extended over controversies to which the United States is a party? Now, I will show to the Senator how much has been done in this direction. I do not know that the Senate will follow me through this case; it is a very curious one and a very important one, and nobody has ever denied the authority of it that I have ever heard of. It was argued by some of the ablest lawyers that were ever in this country, Mr. Fulton and Mr. White, and the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Thompson when the court was about as able as it has ever been.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the case?

Mr. MORGAN. The case of Sampeyreac and Stewart vs. The United States, reported in 7 Peters. Taney was Attorney-General, Marshall was Chief Justice, and so on. It was an appeal from the supreme court of the Territory of Arkansas. That was called a supreme court in the Federal sense, a court whose jurisdiction was derived from an act of Congress.

The appellant, Sampeyreac, under the act of Congress of the 26th of May, 1824—

Which is on my desk—

entitled "An act enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," exhibited the bill against the United States, which was filed in the clerk's office of the superior court, in the Territory of Arkansas, in chancery, sitting on the 21st day of November, 1827—

I will remark as I go along that this act of Congress is very much like that which constitutes the present Court of Private Land Claims in Arizona and New Mexico, whose jurisdiction is entirely unavailing, and no appeal can be taken from any of their decisions, unless I am right in this bill; but they do not require any final judgments there. You may take a case bodily into the Supreme Court of the United States, according to that act, and try it de novo. I made the point here before the Senate when that bill was under consideration, and after due deliberation, Mr. Edmunds leading in the argument in opposition to my views, he satisfied the Senate, and satisfied me, too, that he was right about it; that we could give the power to the court. If we break down this bill upon that subject, and the Supreme Court should ever have occasion to review our decision about it, they will destroy the jurisdiction of that Private Land Claims Court so far as appeal is concerned. The bill—stating that, being an inhabitant of Louisiana, he did, on the 6th day of October, 1789, address a letter to the governor of the then Spanish province of Louisiana, asking for 10 arpens of land in front, with the usual depth, on Strawberry River, within the district of Arkansas, to be granted to him in full property; and that the said governor did, on the 11th day of October, 1789, make an order of survey upon said petition, which the appellant alleges is such a claim as might have been perfected into a complete title under and in conformity to the laws, usages, and customs of the Government of Spain under which the same originated, had not the sovereignty of the country been transferred to the United States, and is therefore provided for by the treaty between the United States and the French Republic, made the 30th April, 1803. The bill prays that this claim may be confirmed, according to the provisions of the act of Congress before mentioned. Upon this petition the clerk of the court issued a subpœna against the district attorney of the United States, which was executed on the 24th of November, 1827.

Now, here is a fact I want the Senate to give attention to. The district attorney was summoned in here, the suit being brought against the United States by authority of this act of Congress.

To this bill the district attorney of the United States filed an answer at the December term of said court, 1827, denying generally the facts and allegations in said bill, and alleging that Sampeyreac was a fictitious person, or was a foreigner, and then dead.

Bringing the subject right before the court by allegations in the answer.

On the 19th day of December, 1827, the district attorney of the United States moved to postpone the final adjudication of the case until the following term, for the following reasons:

1. The petition and subpœna in this case were served on the United States within one month of the present term of this court, but more than fifteen days allowed by law; and in consequence of this short notice the United States attorney has not answered this bill until the present term.

2. Has not had a sufficient length of time to take counter depositions, if counter evidence does exist.

3. There are many more cases pending in this court on the same principles, and similarly situated in all respects; and the attorney for the United States asks this continuance for the purpose of procuring such evidence as may exist on the part of the Government.

The court proceeded to hear the cause, and, upon the deposition of one John Heberard, entered on that day a decree against the United States, in favor of said Sampeyreac, for 400 arpens of land.

On the 14th day of February, 1828, a deed purporting to be a decree executed by Sampeyreac—

I suppose it meant a deed—transferring his claim to the clerk's certificate of the existence of this decree, and of all his right, title, and interest in said decree to John J. Bowie, was proved and admitted to record on the 22d day of October, 1828, in the office of the circuit court of Hempstead County, in the Territory of Arkansas, and which title was transferred by Bowie to Joseph Stewart in December, 1828—

There are two conveyances—

by virtue of which transfer the said Stewart filed with the register of the land office at Little Rock an application for the NE. 17, 11 S., 26 W., and E. ½ SE. 17, 11 S., 26 W., and W. ½ NE. 13, 11 S., 27 W., and which application was admitted by the register on the 13th of December, 1828.

There it passed through the court, passed through two subsequent conveyances, passed through the land office, and a certificate was given and entered.

At the April term, 1830, of the court, the United States attorney, upon leave granted, filed a bill charging that the decree entered by the court at the December term, 1827, in the case of Sampeyreac, was obtained by fraud and surprise, and alleging that the court erred in proceeding to the trial of said cause, at the said December term, without having set said cause for hearing, and without affording the United States time to prove the injustice of the claim. The bill charges that the original petition to Governor Mero, and the order of survey are forgeries; which fact has come to the knowledge of the attorney since the decree was made; that Sampeyreac is a fictitious person—

He set that up in his answer—or if he ever did exist, is dead;—

Putting it in the same form in this motion as he did in the original suit—that Heberard and the other witnesses committed perjury in this case; and that the petition and order of survey were made since 1789; and that record evidence has been discovered since the decree, which will be produced upon the hearing to prove the forgery.

Sampeyreac was proceeded against as an absent defendant, after the return of the subpœna, that "he was not to be found in the Territory of Arkansas," and a decree pro confesso was entered as to him on the 28th day of October, 1830. Before this decree was entered Joseph Stewart was permitted to file his answer and was made a defendant in this case, which was excepted to on the part of the United States, and a bill of exceptions was signed by the court on the 28th October, 1830.

It was not charged or contended that Stewart purchased with a knowledge of the forgery either of the original grant or of the transfer from Sampeyreac to Bowie.

The final decree reversing—

Notice the character of the decree—

The final decree reversing and annulling the decree entered in favor of Sampeyreac at December term, 1827, was delivered by the court February 7, 1831.

From this decree this appeal was taken by Joseph Stewart for himself and Sampeyreac.

There was a court, the same court, reversing and annulling a former decree, not reviewing it and dismissing the bill, but letting the bill stand and the record remaining entirely untouched, and the former decree was reversed and set aside and held for naught, just as this bill proposes that this thing shall be done. Then it goes on to give the very elaborate arguments of counsel.

Mr. GRAY. How was that court created?

Mr. MORGAN. A court created just exactly like our court here. The jurisdiction was conferred upon the circuit court of Missouri in the first place, then that jurisdiction was afterwards extended to include the Territory of Arkansas, but the jurisdiction was to hear and determine claims that were filed in behalf of persons who claimed that they held land by grants from the Spanish Government before we acquired our title by treaty to the territory, and the court, the United States being a party defendant in the suit in the nature of a bill in equity, would go on and decree whether or not the claimant was entitled to the land and make a final disposal of it in that way. In the act creating the jurisdiction in the Missouri court an appeal was given expressly by statute. When we came to enact a law to extend jurisdiction to the Arkansas court nothing was said about the appeal, and it was contended, the provision having been omitted and the jurisdiction of the supreme court on the other statute being entirely statutory, that there was no right of appeal.

This case comes up on appeal from the superior court in the Territory of Arkansas.

The decree of the court was founded upon proceedings instituted under an act of Congress entitled "An act for further extending the powers of the judges of the superior court of the Territory of Arkansas, under the act of the 26th May, 1824, and for other purposes," passed the 8th of May, 1830. (Pamph. Laws, ch. 90.)

This act declares that the act of 1824 (7 Laws U. S., 300) shall be continued in force, so far as the said act relates to the claims within the Territory of Arkansas, until the 1st day of July, 1831—

That is the point Senators should bear in mind—

for the purpose of enabling the court in Arkansas, having cognizance of claims under the said act, to proceed by bills of review filed or to be filed in the said court on the part of the United States for the purpose of revising all or any of the decrees of the said court, in cases wherein it shall appear to the said court, or be alleged in such bills of review, that the jurisdiction of the same was assumed in any case on any forged warrant, concession, grant, order of survey, or other evidence of title. And in every case wherein it shall appear to the said court, on the prosecution of any such bill of review, that such warrant, concession, grant, order of survey, or other evidence of title is a forgery, it shall be lawful, and the said court is hereby authorized to proceed, by further order and decree, to reverse and annul any prior decree or adjudication upon such claim; and, thereupon, such prior decree or adjudication shall be deemed and held in all places whatever to be null and void to all intents and purposes.

It just kills that decree and it stops there—not a bill of review under the ordinary practice, where the case in review, the whole case is opened, the decree is set aside, and the litigation renewed upon the basis of the proposition presented in the bill for review.

Upon the proceedings on the bill of review instituted under this act, the court pronounced the following decree: "It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the former decree of this court, in favor of the defendant Bernardo Sampeyreac against the United States, for 400 acres of land, pronounced and recorded at the December term of this court in the year 1827, be, and the same is hereby, reversed, annulled, and held for naught."

Who ever heard of an appellate court reversing a case except in virtue of a statute conferring upon that court that peculiar jurisdiction? It is a solecism in the mind of any lawyer to imagine such a situation possible.

From this decree the present appeal was taken.

To a right understanding of the questions which have been made at the bar, it will be necessary briefly to state the proceedings which took place under the original bill.

That bill or petition was filed on the 21st of November, 1827, under the provisions of the act of the 26th of May, 1824 (7 Laws U. S., 300), setting forth that the complainant, Bernardo Sampeyreac, on the 6th of October, 1789, he then being an inhabitant of Louisiana, presented a petition to the then governor of the province, asking a grant for a tract of land in full property, containing 10 arpens in front, by the usual depth, on Strawberry River, etc. That afterwards on the 11th of October, 1789, the governor granted the petition. That at the time the grant was so made an order of survey was issued to the surveyor-general of the province. That by virtue of such grant and order of survey the petitioner acquired a claim to the land; which claim is secured to him by the treaty between the United States and the French Republic, of the 30th of April, 1803.

The district attorney put in an answer, denying the several facts and allegations in the bill; and alleging that grants could only be made legally to persons in existence and actually residing in Louisiana. That Sampeyreac, in whose name the bill is filed, is a fictitious person never having had any actual existence; or if such person ever had any existence he was a foreigner; or is now dead, and made no transfer or assignment of the claim in his lifetime. That he has no legal representative in existence; nor is there anyone now living who is authorized to file this bill or prosecute this suit; and prayed that the bill might be dismissed.

A witness by the name of John Heberard was examined and sworn to all the material facts necessary to establish the claim; and the court thereupon ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Bernardo Sampeyreac recover of the United States the said 400 arpens of land.

The bill of review is founded upon the allegation that the original decree was obtained by fraud and surprise.

Omitting now any allusion to the forgery at all—

The bill of review is founded upon the allegation that the original decree was obtained by fraud and surprise. That the original petition and order of survey exhibited in the case are forged.

But the surprise and fraud are the basis of the jurisdiction claimed in that bill—

That Heberard and the other witnesses in the cause committed the crime of perjury. That the order of survey was never signed by Mero, governor of Louisiana, as the same purports to have been, and that this fact has come to the knowledge of the district attorney since the decree was entered. And the bill further charges that the said Sampeyreac is a fictitious person.

At the October term, 1830, this bill was taken pro confesso, against Sampeyreac, at which term the appellant, Joseph Stewart, appeared in court and prayed to be made a defendant and have leave to file an answer to the bill. This was resisted by the district attorney; but an order was made by the court permitting Stewart to be made a defendant with leave to file an answer. To which the district attorney excepted.

The answer of Stewart denies the frauds and forgeries alleged in the bill, but avers that if there was any fraud, corruption, or forgery, he is ignorant of it; and that he was a bona fide purchaser of the claim for a valuable consideration from one John J. Bowie, who conveyed to him the claim of the said Bernardo Sampeyreac by deed bearing date about the 22d of October, 1828. Upon the final hearing the court reversed the original decree, as has been already stated.

The objections which have been taken at the bar to this decree may be considered under the following points:

1. Whether, under the act of 1824, the court had authority to entertain the bill of review; and if not, then,

2. Whether the act of 1830 is a constitutional law, and confers such authority.

3. Whether the proceedings on this bill of review can be sustained under the act of 1830.

That act was passed after the bill was filed.

"4. Whether admitting Stewart to be a bona fide purchaser of the claim of Sampeyreac he is protected against the title set up by the United States.

"1. We think it unnecessary to go into an examination of the questions which have been made under the first point. Although the act of 1824 directs that every petition which shall be presented under its provisions shall be conducted according to the rules of a court of equity, it may admit of doubt whether all the powers of a court of chancery in relation to bills of review are vested in that court. And as the view taken by this court upon the other points renders a decision upon this unnecessary we pass it over without expressing any opinion upon it.

"2. The ground upon which it has been argued that the act of 1830 is unconstitutional is that a right had become vested in Stewart before the act was passed"—

I commend that to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi as a full answer to one of his propositions—and that the effect and operation of the law is to deprive him of a vested right To determine the force and application of this objection, it becomes necessary to look at the claim, as it now appears, before the court. It is founded by the decree of the court below, and is admitted at the bar, that Sampeyreac is a fictitious person. That the petition purporting to have been presented by him to Mero, governor of the province of Louisiana, and the order of survey alleged to have been made thereupon, are forgeries. These are the only evidence of title upon which the original claim rests. And it is proved and admitted that the deed purporting to have been given by Sampeyreac to Bowie, under whom Stewart claims, is also a forgery. The bill or petition filed in the original cause alleges that the claim is secured by the treaty between the United States and the French Republic, of the 30th of April, 1803. This, however, has not been insisted upon on the argument here; and there is certainly no color for pretending that a claim founded in fraud and forgery is sanctioned by the treaty."

That is a very good point.

The title to the land in question passed by the treaty, and became vested in the United States; and there has been no act on the part of the United States, by which they have parted with the title. It is contended, however, that this right or title has been taken away by the original decree in this case, under the act of 1824. By the fourteenth section of that act, all its provisions are extended to the Territory of Arkansas; and it is declared that the superior court of that Territory shall have, hold, and exercise jurisdiction in all cases, in the same manner and under the same restrictions and regulations in all respects, as is given by the same act to the district court of the State of Missouri. And by the second section of the act it is declared that in all cases the party, against whom the judgment or decree of the court may be finally given, shall be entitled to appeal within one year from its rendition to the Supreme Court of the United States, the decision of which court shall be final and conclusive between the parties; and should no appeal be taken, the judgment or decree of the district court shall in a like manner be final and conclusive.

No appeal was taken within the year, and the question is whether the United States, by neglecting to appeal, have lost their right; and if not, whether the remedy provided by the act of 1830 to assert that right is in violation of the Constitution. If Sampeyreac was a real person, and appeared here setting up this objection, it might present a different question, although it is not admitted even in that case that the United States would be concluded as to the right. But the original decree in this case was a mere nullity; it gave no right to anyone. The title still remained in the United States, and the most that can be said is that by omitting to appeal within the time limited by the act the remedy thereby provided was gone, and the decree became final and conclusive with respect to such remedy.

But the act of 1830 provides a new remedy; and it may be added that the act of 1824 declares the decree to be final and conclusive between the parties. And as Sampeyreac was a fictitious person, he was no party to the decree, and the act in strictness does not apply to the case. But, considering the act of 1830 as providing a remedy only, it is entirely unexceptionable. It has been repeatedly decided in this court that the retrospective operation of such a law forms no objection to it. Almost every law providing a new remedy affects and operates upon causes of action existing at the time the law is passed. The law of 1830 is in no respect the exercise of judicial powers. It only organizes a tribunal with powers to entertain judicial proceedings.

Will the Senate please notice that distinction?

The law of 1830 is in no respect the exercise of judicial powers—

Which, of course, means judicial powers as they were known at the common law—

It only organizes a tribunal with powers to entertain judicial proceedings. When the original decree was entered there was no person in existence whose claim could be ripened into a right against the United States by omitting to appeal. Stewart was not only no party to the decree, but his purchase from Bowie was nearly a year after the decree was entered.

Had Sampeyreac been a real person, having a decree in his favor, and Stewart had afterwards purchased of Bowie the right which that decree established, it might have given him some equitable claim; but it would have been subject to all prior equitable as well as legal rights. Nor would it be available in any respect in the present case, for Stewart in no manner whatever connects himself with Sampeyreac. As it is admitted that the deed purporting to have been given by Sampeyreac to Bowie is a forgery, Stewart is therefore a mere stranger to this decree, and can derive no benefit from it.

It is said that if this bill of review was filed under the act of 1830 the court had no jurisdiction, the bill having been filed in April and the law not passed until the May following. But the act in terms applies to bills filed or to be filed, and of course cures his defect, if any existed. Such retrospective effect is no unusual course in laws providing new remedies.

The act of 1803 amending the judicial system of the United States (3 Laws U. S. 560) declares that from all final judgments or decrees rendered or to be rendered in any circuit court, etc., an appeal shall be allowed to the Supreme Court, etc.

That statute is what has been troubling the Senator from Mississippi, instead of the Constitution of the United States.

It therefore forms no objection to the law that the cause of action existed antecedent to its passage so far as it applies to the remedy and does not affect the right.

3. But it is objected, in the next place, that this bill of review can not be sustained under the act of 1830; that it was not filed and prosecuted under the limitations and restrictions and according to the course and practice of a court of chancery in such a proceeding. We think it unnecessary to examine whether all the technical rules required in the ordinary course of chancery proceedings on a bill of review have been pursued in the present case. The act clearly does not require it.

And if the act does not require it, who does? That is the question.

It authorizes bills of review to be filed on the part of the United States for the purpose of revising all or any of the decrees of the said court in cases wherein it shall appear to the said court or be alleged in such bills of review that the jurisdiction of the same was assumed, in any case, on any forged warrant, concession, grant, order of survey, or other evidence of title.

This statute was passed for the Sampeyreac case.

If Congress had a right to provide a tribunal in which the remedy might be prosecuted they clearly had a right to prescribe the manner in which it should be pursued. The great and leading object was to provide for revising the original decree, or granting a new trial. The material allegation required is, that the original decree was founded upon some forged evidence of title; and this is very fully set out in the bill.

Not that the party had no title, but that there was forged evidence of title to it; a particular thing had been done, the effect of which must be gotten rid of.

That it was not the intention of the law that the court should be confined to the technical rules of a court of chancery on bills of review is evident from the provision in the last clause of the first section of the act, which directs the court to proceed on such bills of review by such rules of practice and regulations as they may adopt for the execution of the powers vested or confirmed in them by the act.

Special provisions to do so and so.

Mr. GRAY. Was any question made in that case, may I ask the Senator, as to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

4. The next inquiry is, whether the appellant, Stewart, has acquired a right to the land by reason of his standing in the character of a bona fide purchaser. The record contains an admission on the part of the United States that he purchased the claims of John J. Bowie by deed, for a valuable consideration, in good faith, some time in November or December, 1828. But this gave him no right to be let in as a party in the bill of review. He was not a party to the original bill, nor could he connect himself with Sampeyreac, the only party to the bill, he being a fictitious person, and the interest of Stewart, whatever it might be, was acquired long after the original decree was entered.

He was an independent claimant—

He was, therefore, a perfect stranger to that decree. The deed purporting to have been given by Sampeyreac to Bowie is admitted to be a forgery. Bowie, of course, had no interest, legal or equitable, which he would convey to Stewart. But admitting Stewart to have been properly let in as a party in the bill of review, the only colorable equity which he showed was the certificate of entry given by the register of the land office, December 13, 1828; and this certificate, founded on a decree in favor of Sampeyreac, a fictitious person, obtained by fraud, and upon forged evidence of title. This certificate is entirely unavailable to Stewart. He can obtain no patent under it if the original decree should remain unreversed; for the act of 1830 forbids any patent thereafter to be issued except in the name of the original party to the decree; and on proof to the satisfaction of the officers, that the party applying is such original party, or is duly authorized by such original party, or his heirs, to receive such patent. The original party to the decree being a fictitious person, no title would pass under the patent, if issued. It would still remain in the United States. But Stewart acquired no right whatever under the deed from Bowie, the latter having no interest that he could convey.

Citing authorities.

In the case of Polk's Lessee vs. Wendall (5 Wheat., 308) it is said by this court that, on general principles, it is incontestable that a grantee can convey no more than he possesses. Hence, those who come in under the holder of a void grant can acquire nothing.

Upon the whole, we think Stewart was improperly admitted to become a party; but considering him a proper party, he has shown no ground upon which he can sustain a right to the land in question.

The decree of the court below is accordingly affirmed, with costs.

That could not be unless there was a valid appeal there, and the question was made whether these parties had a right to appeal, whether the court could entertain jurisdiction of it, although the act which extended the jurisdiction of the Missouri court over the Territory of Arkansas did not provide for an appeal—and I have the act here to show that it did not—and that point was made in the argument of counsel, and passed upon by the court when they assumed jurisdiction in this case by appeal.

Mr. President, this bill was really framed upon that authority. The Congress of the United States, in order to free the Government of this country from the effect of a decree obtained by fraud, authorized, long after that decree had been rendered and long after the period for an appeal upon that decree had expired, a bill to be filed in the name of the United States to do what? Not to reclaim the title to the land, not to expunge or cancel certain deeds of conveyance which the parties held, which might be reached under the doctrine to quiet title, to remove cloud from title—the act of Congress authorized the bill to be filed for the purpose of annulling and reversing and destroying a particular decree which had been obtained by fraud and forgery against the Government, and after the court that took jurisdiction had completed its examination of that particular question, whether there was fraud employed in the obtaining of that decree, and when the court found affirmatively that it had been, its decree was rendered, as I have read, to reverse, annul, and set aside that decree, and there it stopped; but it brushed that thing out of the way.

Now, here was a controversy with the United States, and that controversy was resolved through the assistance of an act of Congress by a proceeding instituted in the nature of proceedings in courts of equity in a court upon which the jurisdiction was then and there conferred.

I regret, Mr. President, that I have had to occupy so much time in this matter, but I have a few more authorities that I want to present. Inasmuch as my friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who represents the Weil case, as I understand, has not appeared, I have abstained from saying anything about it until that Senator shall be present or some other Senator shall be present who feels an interest in that case and desires the Senate to take action contrary to what the committee recommends. So I shall have to devote a little time to-morrow to the amplification of the authorities. It is particularly requisite that I should do so because of the objection of Senators of great ability to my programme, and also because I have not as yet laid before the Senate all of the cases which I think bear upon this proposition of law.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT SOUTH ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 217) to amend an act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn.," approved April 26, 1890.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn." approved April 26, 1890, as amended by an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the construction of a bridge at South St. Paul, Minn.,'" approved February 24, 1891, be, and hereby is, amended as follows:

First, by striking out section 1 of said bill as amended and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the South St. Paul Belt Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct and maintain, at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, a railroad bridge, or a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge, across the Mississippi River from a suitable point on its west bank, at or near the city of South St. Paul in the State of Minnesota, and within the limits of section 2, township 27, range 22 west, to a corresponding point on its east bank, and to lay on or over said bridge a railroad track or tracks for the more perfect connection of any railroad or railroads that are or shall be constructed to said river, on either or both sides thereof, at or opposite said places, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter provided; that said bridge shall not interfere with the free navigation of said river beyond what is necessary in order to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, or damage resulting from the same, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States in and for any district in which any portion of said bridge or obstruction touches; said bridge may, at the option of the company building the same, be constructed to provide for the passage of railroad trains alone, or for the passage of railroad trains and for the safe passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, all for such reasonable rates of toll as may be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War."

Second, by striking out section 7 of said bill and substituting in lieu thereof the following, to wit:

"SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of the approval of these amendments."

The report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was read, as follows:

The only effect of this amendment is to extend the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge authorized by the act, and to change its location from points in section 10 to section 2, in the same town and range, less than 1 mile. The United States Engineer's Department reports that that there is no objection to the passage of the bill. Your committee therefore recommends that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota as to whether there is any amendment to this bill recommended by the committee?

Mr. HALL. No, sir; there is no amendment recommended.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if this bill comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. HALL. It is reported from the committee with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4843) to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and will state in explanation of it to the House that it is a proposed amendment to what is known as the oleomargarine bill, which was reported by the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Missouri that in the judgment of the Chair the bill goes to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Missouri moves to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, let us have that bill read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think that the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary clearly embraces the subject-matter of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion for reference must be decided without debate. The Chair decides that the bill properly goes to the Committee on the Judiciary; the gentleman from Missouri moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HATCH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 49.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays.

One-fifth of the members rising to second the demand, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 135, nays 111, not voting 85; as follows:

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief memorial of the World's and National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, representing half a million of the women of America, in favor of settling national disputes by arbitration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] that this memorial be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. MORSE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will move that the memorial be printed in the RECORD, if that is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time.

NAVAL RESERVE BATTALION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

By Mr. GROUT (by request): A bill (H. R. 4852) to provide for organizing a naval reserve battalion in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that bills may be filed with the Speaker at any time during the day, to be referred under his direction to the several committees. I make this suggestion to save the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman make his proposition broad enough to cover resolutions also?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the suggestion, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that bills may be filed with the Speaker at any time during the day, to be referred under his direction. Is there objection?

Mr. McMILLIN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that as we have gone on under this system until now, when the rules are so nearly adopted, we had better adhere to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Chair would suggest that if we are to go on with the introduction of bills, there had better be a call of the States and Territories.

THE RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the discussion yesterday with a great deal of interest, and was much concerned with that part of it which related to the rights and interests and duties of the new member. I was especially alert when the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber cautioned the new member in regard to what he might lose and advised him in regard to what he might secure. We were admonished that a minority would soon have this House by the throat, and that it would be practically impossible for the majority to transact business unless the rules of the Fifty-first Congress were adopted by this body. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] told us that under the rules reported by the majority of the Committee on Rules chaos would be enthroned and the majority ingulfed.

The gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA], seeming to have a different conception of the situation, informed the new member that under the rules of the Fiftieth Congress, recommended with a few amendments by the majority of your committee, the Committee on Rules would have the power to institute such a reign of tyranny as would deprive the individual member of all rights whatsoever. In this state of uncertainty, and with these counsels divided, with the "doctors disagreeing," the new member, I presume, will have to make up his own mind as best he may and cast his vote upon his own judgment.

The question before the House now is general, and not as to the details of these rules. The differences between the rules recommended by the majority and those recommended by the minority of the committee are few in number, but fundamental in character. In the one code is the philosophy of Democracy, the other is the philosophy of modern Republicanism as illustrated in the Fifty-first Congress. A very short time ago we in this House listened with attention and with pleasure to eulogies pronounced upon two distinguished ex-Speakers of this House, Messrs. Randall and Grow, and the gentlemen who spoke at that time held up to our admiring gaze the Speakers who had been eminently fair and eminently considerate and judicial in the discharge of the functions of the high office.

In such eulogy, perhaps, and in the conscience which lies beneath and supports it, we may find something to guide us in determining which philosophy with respect to the rules is the true and correct one, which the better deserves our support and which deserves our condemnation. We did not hear it asserted at that time, and we have never heard it asserted except on special occasions and to serve special ends, that Speakers were to be commended because they enforced rules or added to rules by sending pages out to hunt members in the lobbies or in the barber shops and return lists of names in order to constitute a quorum. We never have heard, when a dispassionate discussion of this question took place upon general principles and far away from party lines and party prejudices, that a Speaker ever endeared himself to his countrymen or that he ever attained to high rank in history except when he rose to the grand dignity of his grand station, conducting himself as a patriot and discharging the functions of his high office with the mind and purpose of a pure and lofty jurist.

The position of Speaker is a judicial position. There is required for the discharge of the functions of that great office a quick and strong grasp of the situation, and a mind that will enable the occupant of that honored chair to dispense impartial justice without asking whether he is the "organ of a majority" or the "organ" of a minority. In that position he is the organ of the law; he is the representative of the House; and when he declares the law he knows no majority; he knows no minority; he knows nothing but the law and his duty in the just discharge of the functions of his exalted position.

The sentiments which were expressed on this subject the other day ought not to be lost sight of in the consideration of the question now before this House. They were in sight in the action that placed in the chair of this body a gentleman who, I doubt not, will illustrate by his ability and his fairness the old truism of a century, that the man who is worthy of the Speaker's chair knows no majority and knows no minority in the discharge of his duties. The Speaker is the choice of the majority, but he is the "organ" of the House. A question submitted to him is a question to be determined according to law, according to precedent, according to justice.

One of the particulars in which the rules recommended by the majority of the committee differ from those recommended by the minority is with reference to the strange device for making a quorum. I will not go into any discussion of that device as a constitutional question. I am content to let that rest where it is. The question has been passed upon and has been decided, so far as this House and its rules are concerned, by the highest tribunal known to this country—by the American people pronouncing judgment at the ballot box. The principle itself is one thing; the vast power for abuse which the incorporation of such a principle in the rules confers upon the Speaker is another thing. The Speaker who understands that he represents the law and is in the chair to declare the law covets no such power and should be tempted by the grant of no such power. He has nothing to do with the question of who is in favor of or who opposes this or that measure brought forward for action, and needs no enlarged counting facilities.

Filibustering is something which, it is said, we can not well define on account of the poverty of our language and the inaccuracy of the expressions which we are forced to use.

Filibustering in its bad sense is very frequently the obstruction of that which we wish to do, and in its justifiable sense it is the obstruction that we interpose to the progress of some other men's schemes. Whatever may be said of the result of filibustering in this country and of the result of filibustering in this House, it is a matter of history that the most infamous schemes ever concocted by vile partisanship, the worst that tyranny dictated or that tyrants have endeavored to enforce, have been defeated, in whole or in part, by resorting to the process of filibustering. Filibustering arises to the dignity of a high duty when it is interposed to check the mad rush of a majority over the rights of a minority. For minorities have rights under the Constitution and according to the old traditions.

But we hear also a great deal about the rights of majorities. We hear, too, that if the new rules proposed for the government of this House be adopted this Committee on Rules will have absolute control of the business of the House. Somebody or some committee must make some selection and must have some power in all such cases. There must be some selection of measures. We have many thousands of bills and resolutions already introduced. There can not be such a thing as every man having just as much time as every other man for the consideration of his bill or bills. If so, then the committees must be swept away, for every man would be in himself a committee of one on his own bills and would be entitled to as much time as any other man without reference to the importance or insignificance, the merits or the demerits, of the measure he seeks to have considered.

Passing from that, you come then to the committee. A majority of the committee controls as to the disposition of the measures there. Passing on from that, as the measures accumulate, there must be some other method adopted which will determine which of the accumulated measures shall have precedence. Where is that power to be lodged? The power is delegated here to the Committee on Rules. That committee has power to make suggestions in regard to such matters; the power of action is with the House itself. If the House ratify the suggestion of the Committee on Rules, then it becomes operative and powerful. The other philosophy would submit to the dictation of one man the determination of such questions. Is a question or a motion dilatory: by the code of the House in the Fifty-first Congress one man determines it without reference to anything else. Shall this or that measure be taken up: one man determines it, and that man becomes, they tell us, "the organ of the House."

Suppose the division of sentiment on the question is not on party lines. Then the side he favors is the majority, under that theory, and the side he opposes is in the minority. There is no determining by the House who are in the majority or who are in the minority; but the Speaker in himself, with this power in his hands, makes the distinction.

By the majority report, on the contrary, it is proposed to refer that matter to the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules are of opinion that a certain matter should be taken up for consideration, and so report to the House. The House determines whether it will or will not accept their recommendations. I think we want to get away from one man power, and from the philosophy that tempts a man to play the rôle of a tyrant and dictator, destroying that equality which under the Constitution should exist here. We want to get away from a power which brought about such scenes as were common in the Fifty-first Congress; scenes that will make it memorable forever, not for the good it attempted to do, but for the evil that it attempted and the evil it consummated, and its methods in attempt and accomplishment. Rules that lodge extraordinary power in the hands of one person, and which rest upon a philosophy in which that person is supposed to carry out the will of the majority, instead of meting out justice to all alike, should have no place here.

What had the Fifty-first Congress in view? The emptying of certain seats in this Hall and the filling of them by men not elected; the passing of a bill to increase the cost of nearly every article of necessity to every person in this broad land, and to increase the income, already huge and growing, of those who had been favored by that species of legislation for more than a quarter of a century. Another purpose was to swell the amount of appropriations for this or that object. And gentlemen cry now, "Do not let us lose the power." What power? The power to increase the appropriations.

How properly, Mr. Speaker, the man who defends the record of the Fifty-first Congress, and whose own record is written in the condemnation stamped upon that record—how well may he say, "Preserve to us the power, the sacred power, to increase the appropriations," so that if possible he may count them for this Congress beyond the billion mark of the dead Congress!

But there was another purpose to be accomplished, another deed of darkness that the Fifty-first Congress was bent upon. That was to deprive the people of the poor privilege left them of expressing at the ballot box their judgment and their will in regard to the selection of the officers and the determination of the policy of this Government. It was designed to place the deputy United States marshal and the little understrapper, picked from the slums for the dirty work he might do, in control of the ballot boxes and of the election returns of the people. It was necessary that this should be accomplished, if accomplished at all, in the dark by the exercise of the strong one-man power; accomplished by overriding the wishes and the will of the people, and by doing violence to the spirit of free government and the precedents of one hundred years. No such things are to be accomplished in this House. The majority here desire no such things. Their history, in all the times when they were in power and in all the times when they were in the minority, shows clearly that they desire no such dangerous power.

Gentlemen upon the other side say that they are willing to submit as a minority to the rules which as a majority they so ruthlessly enforced. That is a wonderful concession. There is a great deal involved in that concession. I take it that with the present

Speaker in the chair these gentlemen know, from his character, his ability, and from the history of all the Democratic Speakers who have sat in that chair, even those who sat there for but a day or an hour, that it is not Democratic to suppress any man in the assertion of his just rights, and that there is no danger of any of the little boys employed in this House being sent abroad to count up a quorum, and no danger that any man upon this floor will not receive decent and considerate treatment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like some gentleman on the other side now to occupy some time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who has charge of the time on that side.

Mr. REED. We have occupied rather more of the time already than has been occupied on the other side, and I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] that he should go on somewhat further, and that he should allow the gentleman to whom an hour was accorded an opportunity to be heard now.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Very well; I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the majority of the Committee on Rules have reported one set of rules for the government of the House and recommend its adoption. The minority of that committee have reported another set of rules and recommend its adoption. I desire, before I come to discuss the difference between the two general propositions, to say a few words upon the subject of the power of the Committee on Rules. That committee is composed of five members, two on the Democratic side, two on the Republican side, and the Speaker ex officio is its chairman. I have had occasion, Mr. Speaker, in former Congresses, when this Committee on Rules has been established, to say that I doubted the propriety of giving to any committee, so small in number as that of which the Committee on Rules is constituted, the power which is conferred upon them by the report of the majority. It is illustrative of the old adage that power is always stealing from the hands of the many to the few.

I rather prefer the more liberal proposition made by resolution a few days ago by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], in which he proposed that the committee which should determine the question as to what should be considered, and when it should be considered, and how it should be considered, should be a broader and larger committee, composed of fifteen members of this House. The Committee on Rules has abundant power already; but if clothed with the additional power which the report of the majority insists they should have, they become virtually the ruling power of the House. We witnessed a striking illustration of this in the last Congress, when we were operating under the rules of the House of the Fifty-first Congress. When an important bill from the Judiciary Committee was brought in, which changed our whole judicial system, we were allowed an hour and a half by the imperious order of the Committee on Rules, by the index hands of that clock, in which to discuss it, and then we were forced to a vote upon it.

In the midst of the discussion of the great tariff bill, the great tax bill of the country, the leader of the last House of Representatives stopped in the midst of its consideration and brought in a rule from the Committee on Rules which imperiously demanded that numbers of pages of that odious bill should be read without discussion, and the House was forced to vote upon it without discussion. I am therefore opposed to clothing the Committee on Rules with power to determine this question for the House.

The two sets of rules differ materially in this: That the one proposes, as I understand it, to abide by the Constitution of the United States in determining what shall constitute a quorum; and the other, the minority report, proposes to disregard that Constitution. Section V of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and the majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day and may be authorized to compel the attendance of a quorum.

That is the provision of the Constitution. Now, what does the minority report of the Committee on Rules propose? It proposes in the first place to clothe the Speaker of the House with the power to count a quorum, as did the rules of the last House. And those of us who were here saw its practical operation. We saw it in the turning out of some fourteen or fifteen members on this side of the House, and we saw it when the Committee on Rules were clothed with the power to come in at any time and present any proposition and determine the time in which the House should discuss it and when the House should vote.

It may be said that the House has the power to overrule the Committee on Rules; but we know what a tendency there is to follow the leaders. They did it in the last House, having a majority on the Republican side, and the probabilities are that we will do it on this side. I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the difference between the two systems of rules proposed for the government of this Congress is mainly upon the question of giving the Speaker the power to count a quorum, and in the further proposition to give him the power to pass a measure by even a very great minority of the House, and especially in that provision which makes 100 (out of a House of 332 members) a quorum in the Committee of the Whole House.

Now, sir, that question was discussed in a former Congress, and the honorable gentleman from Maine, the Speaker of the last House of Representatives, took part in the discussion which occurred in the Congress of that year. The question arose there as here on the adoption of this very rule, which in the last House of Representatives gave power to the Speaker to count a quorum and compel members to vote. The question was very ably discussed then by what constituted men of the largest ability in that House. It was discussed by such men as Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, Mr. Conger, afterwards a Senator from Michigan, and a number of other gentlemen; and it was also discussed by the honorable gentleman from Maine himself [Mr. REED]. Let us see what Mr. Garfield, then regarded as one of the best parliamentarians in the House and a leader of the House, said upon that subject. Mr. Garfield, on page 576 of the RECORD, said:

> Forty men under the eye of the speaker of the House of Commons present no sort of analogy on which to found a rule for use in a House of less than 300 members and where it requires 150 to make a quorum. I hope my friend from Virginia will not press his proposition to a conclusion as a part of the body of our rules, for we shall be compelled to oppose it with all our might.

That was the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, afterwards President of the United States. That was concurred in by Mr. Conger, afterwards a Senator from his State, and also a man of distinguished ability in this House and in the Senate. His language was:

> But, sir, while the Constitution declares what shall constitute a quorum to do business in this House, this rule declares that when there shall be ascertained by one man a quorum present, a rule shall do the business of the House, a rule shall legislate, a rule shall determine the voice and wish of the Representatives of the people; so that on the passage of a bill, although there may be but 15 voting in the affirmative and 5 in the negative, yet by virtue of this rule, if there be a majority present by compulsion or otherwise, the bill shall be declared passed on the vote pro and con of but 20 members. Does the great expounder of the State of Virginia claim that such a result would be arrived at by any constitutional means?
> I have no fear that this amendment will be adopted in this House, because it would be wrong in itself; it would be unconstitutional; it would be violently partisan. I have no fear that the fair-minded men of this House on either side will adopt so violent and partisan a measure.

This question was also discussed by the honorable gentleman from Maine, the Speaker of the last House, and on page 578 he expressed his views upon the very proposition that is now in the minority report. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, if it was my purpose to reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Phister], it seems to me that it would be a suitable and proper reply to say to him that the constitutional idea of a quorum is not the presence of a majority of the members of the House, but a majority of the members present and participating in the business of the House. It is not the visible presence of members, but their judgments and their votes, that the Constitution calls for.
> I prefer, however, in the short time which I have, to discuss this question upon a different basis. This privilege, which the minority of this House at the last session availed itself of, is a privilege which every minority has availed itself of since the foundation of this Government. By pure accident, in looking over an index of the RECORD this morning, I found the account of a resolution, which was drawn up by a distinguished member of this House from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler], to cause the arrest of a distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] for not voting. I believe, however, nothing ever came of that resolution.
> Now, what is the practical upshot of the present practice? It is that the members of the minority of this House upon great occasions demand that every bill which is passed shall receive the absolute vote of a majority of the members elected. They do this in the face and eyes of the country. If they demand upon any frivolous occasion that there shall be such an extraordinary vote as that, they do it subject to the censure of the people of this land. This practice has hitherto kept this House in proper condition upon this subject, so that there has been no improper impeding of the public business.
> It is a valuable privilege for the country that the minority shall have the right by this extraordinary mode of proceeding to call the attention of the country to measures which a party in a moment of madness and of party feeling is endeavoring to enforce upon the citizens of this land. And it works equally well with regard to all parties, for all parties have their times when they need to be checked, so that they may receive the opinions of the people who are their constituents and who are interested in the results of their legislation.
> I say that as a practical matter the results hitherto throughout all our history have justified the construction which those upon this side of the House have put upon this matter, and which has been put equally by members of the other side in times past. I must say that I am glad to see that this question is being discussed not by divisions of party, but that gentlemen are taking views upon it with reference to its whole bearing, past and future as well as present.

That was the sentiment of the honorable gentleman from Maine, expressed on this floor in 1880. In the last House we adopted the rules which now constitute the report of the minority of the committee, in violation, as I contended then and now, of the Constitution of the United States, which reposes the power of legislation, so far as this House is concerned, in the majority of the members elect.

Now, this body is composed, I believe, of 332 members, which will require 162 to constitute a majority of that whole number, and if these rules be adopted it is in the power of the man who may hold the position of Speaker to constitute a quorum here whenever he chooses to count it.

Now, sir, that subject came up before 1880 in a discussion of the question, when a man held the seat that you now occupy, and who left it with a distinction and reputation that is hardly surpassed by any who have filled it, probably before or since. I allude to the present Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, when this proposition was sought to be enforced upon the passage of a measure which would have been more deleterious to this country than any other measure that has ever been passed. By the work of the heroic leader of the Democratic party, Samuel J. Randall, backed by the minority and helped by the rulings of Mr. Blaine, that bill was defeated. I allude to the first force bill. Now, he says, in reference to the power of the Speaker to make a quorum of his own, using a homely adage in illustration which strikes us with great force:

One man may lead a horse to water, but a thousand can not make him drink.

So it is, sir, the right and the power of the Representative to speak for his constituents rests and abides in the heart and conscience of the member who represents them, and no man can or ought to be allowed to speak for them save that Representative.

Yet, sir, if the minority report is adopted we would have the rules of the last House, which disregarded the constitutional provision that a quorum to do business shall be constituted of the majority of the members elect. In that same debate in 1880 Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, who was then here, took part. We never had a clearer head in this legislative body. Though he sat in a rocking chair with rollers, just in front of where the Speaker now sits, and was unable to rise to his feet, his great mind was as bright while he occupied that seat all through the session as when he stood to speak with all the power of his young manhood. He then spoke, and I quote his language from the speech that was published at that time. Mr. Stephens interrupted Mr. McLane of Maryland, who was then speaking, and said:

Mr. STEPHENS. Allow me to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: that the object of this amendment is to give a constructive vote to those who actually do not vote.

Mr. MCLANE. I do not so understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS. If not, what would it do? It requires a majority of a quorum on the record—that is, on the Journal—to constitute a vote of the House. If the object of this proposition is not to establish a system of constructive voting as to those who are absent or not voting, what do you gain?

Mr. MCLANE. The amendment not only does not provide for constructive voting, but it states distinctly that the member refusing to vote shall remain recorded not voting precisely as if he had been excused from voting, but that his presence shall be noted and he shall be counted to make a quorum. The analogy I present is that if the House had excused him he would still not have voted, but would have been counted to make a quorum.

Mr. STEPHENS. But when you take the yeas and nays upon the passage of a bill, it is never passed unless a majority of the House, a quorum, vote upon its passage. If there be not a majority of those thus voting, after leaving out the excused, the measure can not be carried. If this amendment means anything practical, it must be to provide for a constructive vote.

Mr. MCLANE. Less than a majority can pass a bill, if those present make with those excused from voting a majority of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Most assuredly not, I think. It requires a majority of those joining in the business to transact the business of the House. Those excused do not join in the transaction of the business from which they have been excused.

That, Mr. Speaker, was the argument made by Mr. Stephens on that occasion. Now, sir, in support of the report from the minority of the Committee on Rules, my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] addressed the House yesterday in a lengthy and well-prepared speech, and, as an illustration of the unjust exercise of the power of a minority under the rules, he cited the action in the Fiftieth Congress in opposition to the bill for the refund of the direct land tax. I thought, Mr, Speaker, as the gentleman from Michigan spoke to us in those fluent tones that always characterize him, that that was an unfortunate illustration for him to adduce. I was in that Congress. I had the honor to follow in the lead of my honorable friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who offered one amendment to that bill. When the proposition was made to refund the direct land tax, the measure so much lauded by the gentleman from Michigan, and opposition to which in the way of "filibustering" he so much deprecated——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I ask my friend to yield me two or three minutes more in which to complete my remarks.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield my colleague two minutes.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] moved to amend that proposition to refund the direct land tax so as to provide also for a refund of the cotton tax, amounting to $60,000,000. A suit involving the constitutionality of that tax had been brought and passed upon in the Federal courts at Memphis and had been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, but, unfortunately for the adjudication of the question by that tribunal, the nine judges were not present, but only eight.

The court, therefore, was a divided court, so that, under the rule of law upon the subject of appeals, the result amounted to an affirmance of the decision of the court in Memphis. The House refused to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. Argument was offered showing how unjust, how unconstitutional and outrageous it was for the Government of the United States to keep in its Treasury that money which had been so unjustly taken from the Southern people at a time of great distress and poverty, but the majority refused to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, and then it was, when equal and exact justice was not accorded to us, that my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES], leading the men who sided with him upon that question, stood upon this floor day after day and night after night in opposition to the measure for the refund of the direct land tax.

I followed the lead of the gentleman from Alabama in that opposition, and I deprecated the agreement which was afterwards made that on a certain day the House should vote upon the question without any further filibustering. I was one of those who were opposed to that agreement, because I believed that the power of the minority was used in that case legitimately to prevent the passage of a law more unjust and inequitable than any that had ever passed the Congress of the United States. For, if you could refund the direct land tax which had been collected, because it had not been collected in the Southern States on account of the war, you could, upon the same principle, go back and refund the income tax and every other tax that had been levied for the prosecution of the war.

Now, under the code of rules proposed by the minority, when the House goes into the Committee of the Whole (where all great appropriation bills must first be considered), it is proposed still further to violate the article of the Constitution prescribing what shall constitute a quorum to do business, by providing that 100 in Committee of the Whole shall constitute a quorum, and as 51 is a majority of 100, the whole power of the House is thus relegated to less than one-fifth of the members of the House. May I not again repeat with emphasis, "That power is always stealing from the hands of the many to the few."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] as entitled to control one hour of the time.

Mr. WATSON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. OTIS].

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, it gives us great pleasure to know that the People's party to-day for the first time is recognized upon the floor of this House. [Laughter and applause.] We deem it, sir, a high honor to be permitted to open the debate in behalf of that young, growing, political giant which, in our opinion, is destined to dominate and control this country from sea to sea and from the Lakes to the Gulf. The People's party comes before this country with the olive branch of peace in one hand and the cornucopia or horn of plenty in the other. Upon our banner, sir, is inscribed, "Union forever, one and indivisible." [Applause.] We believe in justice to all, equal rights to all, and special privileges to none. We say: Give us universal equality and fraternity world-wide. These are our mottoes. These are our principles. The great common people of America have been aroused, and we say let office-seeking politicians slumber, and let calamity-makers henceforth hold their peace.

Mr. Speaker, when the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] yielded us twenty minutes I promised that we would confine ourselves as nearly as possible to the substitute that we have offered, and which was read by the Clerk of this House on Monday, and will be found printed upon page 525 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In doing so, sir, we do not propose to consume the time by reading at length that substitute, but we do propose to state plainly and clearly the propositions involved in it, which are three:

1. The creation of a new committee upon the order of business in this House;

2. The election of the standing committees by the House itself; and

3. (What may be considered a corollary of the second:) The election by the committees themselves of their own chairmen and the naming of their own clerks.

This is what the substitute proposes; and this is what we believe is right. We do not propose to discuss this question in all its bearings, but simply as it relates to the principle of popular rights, or the principle of rule by the many as opposed to domination by the few.

The first proposition takes the place to a certain extent of the present Committee on Rules; in other words, it relegates the Committee on Rules to its proper place, and institutes a committee on order of business to attend to its own business. We claim that it is not and ought not to be the province of any three, five, or even seven men in this body to dictate the course of legislation and to say what this House should deliberate upon. If you will refer to the substitute you will notice that this committee on order of business is to be composed of one member from each State and Territory of the Union, to be nominated by that State or Territory; so that under this provision this committee would embrace a representation of the entire Union. It would not include merely a few individuals or represent simply the conceptions of a few men coming from only a few portions of this country. In our view a committee of this kind would be the most important committee of this House; and we conceive it to be a very necessary one.

It seems to us that as yet no good reasons have been urged by gentlemen who have spoken on this question why Rule X should stand in its present form; yet I take notice that our Democratic friends and our Republican friends are alike in favor of that rule. We claim that the rule violates the fundamental principle of free government. We claim that the great common people of this country should rule this country, that it should not be ruled by one man or by three men. We favor the universal equality advocated by Thomas Jefferson in his inaugural address. We claim to be in favor of equal rights, not special privileges, which this Rule X, as we claim, gives. It is a principle that we are advocating. We are urging no objection to the present officers or the present committees of this House. Our party claims to be founded upon equal rights, upon the Jeffersonian doctrine of equality, upon the Washingtonian idea of union, and upon the Abraham Lincoln idea of protection to labor and its superiority over capital.

Mr. Speaker, in presenting this substitute for Rule X, we do so in no captious spirit. We disclaim any personal objection to our present presiding officer, or to the make-up of the present committees of the Fifty-second Congress. It is simply the method, as such, to which we take exception. It violates a principle of popular government; it confers special privileges upon a few, and robs the many of their just rights. From our standpoint, as free, independent American citizens, Rule X, as reported by the Committee on Rules, is simply "one-man power," or what we choose to term "rank partisanism grown to full maturity and overshadowing popular rights."

Ours is supposed to be a representative Government, this House a representative body. Each member upon this floor is supposed to represent about 174,000 persons—more or less. Coming up from our respective districts in the interest of our constituents we are clothed with equal authority, and under the Constitution and laws of our country we are entitled to equal privileges upon this floor. But under this Rule X we no sooner reach the national Capitol than we are called upon to practically surrender our delegated power into the hands of a Speaker and a Committee on Rules.

In our national Constitution we find the name of "Speaker" mentioned but once and his duties nowhere referred to. But under the rules of this House he is exercising powers never contemplated by the Constitution and never looked for by the founders of our Government. We are not finding any fault with the honorable gentlemen who have filled this high office, or making any criticisms of their record and character. But as American freemen we can not indorse the rule under consideration, that transfers the political rights of over 60,000,000 people into the hands of one or three. Under the rules, customs, and precedents, now grown venerable by age, the Speaker of the House of Representatives has become more powerful in molding the character of legislation than any other official personage in our Government. This power of the Speaker has been so well described by James Bryce in his American Commonwealth that I desire here to quote his language:

> Not only does he, at the beginning of each Congress, select all the members of each of these committees, he even chooses the chairman of each, and thereby vests the direction of its business in hands approved by himself. The chairman is of course always selected from the party which commands the House and the committee is so composed as to give that party a majority. Since legislation, and so much of the control of current administration as the House, has been able to bring within its grasp, belong to these committees, their composition practically determines the action of the House on all questions of moment, and as the chairmanships of the more important committees are the posts of most influence, the disposal of them is a tremendous piece of patronage, by which a Speaker can attract support to himself and his own section of the party, reward his friends, give politicians the opportunity of rising to distinction or practically extinguish their Congressional career.
> The Speaker is of course far from free in disposing of these places. He has been obliged to secure his own election to the chair by promises to leading members and their friends, and while redeeming such promises he must also regard the wishes of important groups of men or types of opinion; must compliment particular States by giving a place on good committees to their prominent Representatives; must avoid nominations which could alarm particular interests. These conditions surround the exercise of his power with trouble and anxiety. Yet, after all, it is power, power which, in the hands of a capable and ambitious man, becomes so far-reaching, that it is no exaggeration to call him the second, if not the first, political figure in the United States, with an influence upon the fortunes of men and the course of domestic events superior in ordinary times to the President's, although shorter in its duration and less patent to the world.

Mr. Speaker, this Rule X is more befitting the despotism of a country like Russia than the free, progressive Republic of America. We can find no good reason why this deliberative body should be converted into a "wild pit," resembling the inner court of the Chicago Board of Trade or the New York Chamber of Commerce. Why should the American House of Representatives become a mere partisan machine, a triumvirate, an engine of power, if you please, running the people's train, with the Speaker standing at the throttle valve, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means acting as conductor, the little Committee on Rules performing the office of brakeman and switch-tender, whilst the balance of the members upon this floor act as traveling passengers, ornamental figureheads, with our feet fettered, our hands tied, and our lips sealed? And if during the two years' journey we should desire anything we must beg for grace and mercy at the shrine of this political trinity—three in one.

Is it any wonder that the members occasionally grow very restless under this rule, and especially toward the close of the session, when all are anxious to push their measures forward? Is it not possible that Rule X is responsible for some of the "wild scenes" that in days gone by have been enacted upon this floor, scenes that are no credit to any legislative body, and much less to the highest legislative body of our nation? We readily admit that adjusting properly the standing committees of this House is no easy task. But in view of the immense power these committees have upon the legislation of the House we believe they ought to be elected by the House.

This rule which has prevailed has created a "parliamentary monopoly." It is a kind of "political heirloom" of the century, venerable in age, but absolutely vicious in principle and unjust in practice. It has been adopted for years by Democrats and Republicans alike, and hence, we are informed, it is dangerous to assail it. And for a new member to make an attack upon this "grand citadel" of power and centralization is said to be "political suicide." So be it. We would rather die bravely fighting for this principle than to die bombarding poor little Chile.

To what extent the alternate domination of political factions, struggling for power and patronage, has been instrumental in perpetuating this rule it is not now necessary to consider. But we believe it is time to call a halt and return to first principles. Our motto is, "The people rule, the whole people, and not a privileged few." This is true American doctrine, and this House of Representatives should have no rule in its code that practically nullifies this fundamental principle of free government.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield the residue of my time to my colleagues on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied nineteen minutes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I always endeavor to listen with respect to the opinions of my colleagues on this floor whether I agree with those opinions or not. I shall continue to do so; and all I ask of my colleagues in return is that I shall have for my opinions the same respectful attention.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that we are here in a very small minority does not for one moment prove that we are not right or that we shall not eventually be the majority. Sir, we take to ourselves as a comfort the recollection that every principle which the American people hold dear was once the passionate protest of a minority against a tyrannical majority. We love the privilege of free worship—the right to bow the knee where we will and how we will, and to fashion upon our lips that religious creed which suits ourselves. Yet, sir, it has not been so long since to assert that principle was to invite the chain, the scaffold, and the rack.

I now come at once to the principle involved in this substitute. I believe this proposition can be defended by reason and by authority. I believe it is founded on principles that are as sound as any principles of free government can possibly be. What are those principles? Will gentlemen pardon me a moment for saying that we speak here as the representatives of those great industrial organizations which complain of certain abuses; which demand certain reforms; and, in order that our full idea may be understood, let me briefly enumerate the most important of these principles. I shall not dwell upon a single one of them.

We demand that national banks shall be abolished as banks of issue. We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver. We demand that the alien ownership of land shall cease. We demand that Senators shall be elected by a direct vote of the people. We demand that the Government shall issue its money (which we understand to be the mere medium of exchange, the mere tool of exchange, and therefore a governmental power), that the Government shall issue such money to the people who need it to perfect their exchanges practically free of cost, and that through the subtreasury plan or some better plan the people shall have the privilege of the use of this money by giving such security as is in the commercial world considered good. We demand that there shall be a graduated income tax. We demand that no man's business shall be built up at the expense of another man's business, and that the burdens of taxation shall be lifted from the necessaries of life.

That is our platform in some of its main features, and may God Almighty strike my lips into silence when I face any audience and am not proud to announce such a creed. Standing here to-day in this magnificent gathering of America's representative men, I say that the toiling millions of our land are looking toward those principles as their means of relief. We are not striving merely for office or official influence. If we had nothing better as our ultimate aim we could afford to ride on the surface of the occasion and trust to the sublimity of luck. But, sir, we take it home to ourselves as a settled purpose that these principles shall be enacted into law. That being the case, what confronts us? We are confronted with a governmental machinery which says to us as plainly as language can say it that so long as this machinery runs in the grooves which it now occupies we shall in vain knock at the doors of legislation and hope for them to be opened.

If the gentlemen upon my right believed these principles were sound, that they ought to be enacted into law, and along the highway of their progress they saw an unconstitutional obstruction, it would be their sworn duty to remove that obstruction. If the gentlemen upon my left believed, as many of them do believe, in these principles and wanted them placed upon the statute books, and along the highway of their legislative progress there was an unconstitutional, illegitimate, usurpatory obstruction, which barred their progress and made the struggle hopeless, they would certainly never cease to fight to remove the obstruction. That is the situation with us.

Now, where is it? You take the United States Senate. We demand that its members shall be elected hereafter by a direct vote of the people. Why? Because we know perfectly well that as now organized it would take the rod of Moses to strike the waters of relief out of that rock. We know that the very concentration of power, the concentration of capital, the concentration of privilege which we are fighting is enthroned and intrenched in the Senate of the United States. No man can successfully deny it. Every great corporation of this land has its agents, its attorneys there, to defend its interests. Every great railroad has its owners and its attorneys there. You strike the oil companies and their champions are there. You strike the manufacturers of the country and their champions are there. And so, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted by the United States Senate as the very type of concentrated privilege, of aggregated wealth, and centralized power, and we might as well expect to sail without leave under the frowning fortress of Gibraltar, loopholed and armored from base to summit, as to pass the obstructions which are presented to our progress there.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WATSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I have examined the substitute to which the gentleman has referred, and in regard to which he has been speaking, and I would like to ask him if that rule is adopted, if the interpretation put upon it by the gentleman is that this House shall be reorganized as contemplated in that rule, or if the rule he seeks to enforce here is to be binding upon some future Congress?

Mr. WATSON. Now, as a matter of course, the gentleman ought to know that the adoption of this rule could only work as the expression of an opinion, which a future Congress might or might not adopt, and which would have no force or effect in this body.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then let me ask the gentleman another question. Is Rule X, in the proposed code of rules, all the objection the gentleman sees to the rules offered by the majority of the Committee on Rules?

Mr. WATSON. Now, if the gentleman will do me the kindness to listen to what I am going to say when I come to the consideration of that particular question, he will not find it necessary to interrupt me.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, can not you answer the question now?

Mr. WATSON. Repeat it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask if Rule X is the only objection the gentleman can see to the code of rules proposed by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. WATSON. It is not the only objection. And now, having answered the gentleman very frankly, I hope no further part of my time will be consumed in this way.

Mr. Speaker, I have with great fairness, and certainly with the desire to adhere to the question at issue, shown where, in my judgment, the trouble is in the other Chamber; and that trouble has been understood not only by our people but by Republicans whose constituents are dissatisfied, by Democrats whose constituents are dissatisfied, and there is nothing so plainly written as that the Senators of the United States will in the future, and not at a very remote day, be chosen by a direct vote of the people.

Now, sir, let us come to the House. If we can demonstrate to our people that the same evil of which they complain now in the Senate exists as fully here as in that body, then the demands will be extended so as to embrace this Chamber, because the reasons extend themselves to it. It has not been denied—the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], who has impressed me as being a man who always has the courage of his convictions, has plainly said—that there is a concentration of power in the hands of the Committee on Rules. It can not be concealed from anybody that there is a concentration of power in the hands of the Speaker. The Speaker and the Committee on Rules are the autocrats of the House.

I ask gentlemen to consider this question for a moment. Where did ever the Speaker of the House of Representatives get the power; where did ever the Constitution give the power; where did ever the statesmen of this country submit that issue to the people; when did you ever take the will of the people upon the question of that delegation of power to the hands of the Speaker? I pause for a reply from any member of this House, either upon my right or upon my left. It has never been taken. The delegation of power to the President of the United States has been ratified by the votes of the people; the delegation of power to the Senate of the United States has likewise been ratified; but at no time in the history of this country has there ever been witnessed the submission of that issue to the people by which a power was given to the Speaker of the House making him the autocrat of the House. Gentlemen may say that the people have actually ratified it by their silence. I deny that the answer is good.

The people have not had the information. The people did not know he had that power. The people supposed that he was the mere presiding officer—the representative of the body—and not its master. Gentlemen may say again that it is delegated to him by general parliamentary law. I deny it. It has never been given to him by parliamentary law anywhere; and I say that this substitute goes back to that doctrine which I love with every drop of blood in my body—from my heels to my head—that Jeffersonian democracy, from which we have all so far departed.

Let me give what Jefferson's Manual says. It is laughed at here as if it were a thing unheard of that the House should choose its committees by ballot and that those committees should choose their chairmen. Mr. Speaker, it has been universal parliamentary law from the time that these very committees wrested tyrannical power from the hands of the Stuarts down to this day. Jefferson says in his Manual, Rule XXIV:

> In the appointment of the standing committees, the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint severally the chairmen of each committee, and then, by one ballot, the other members necessary to complete the same.

Now as to the House:

> The person first named is usually permitted to act as chairman, but this is a matter of courtesy.

It has now become a matter of right.

> Every committee having a right to elect their own chairman, who presides over them, puts questions, and reports their proceedings to the House.

We plant ourselves, gentlemen, upon that Jeffersonian rock, and we ask the Democracy whether they will vote with us upon it or not.

Not only that. In the English House of Commons we find this to be the fact. I quote from Cushing:

> In England committees are usually named in the first instance by the person who proposes the resolution for their appointment, subject, of course, to the control of the House. On great important questions they are chosen by ballot, and the most important committees considered merely with reference to the state of parties naming them, as we have already seen, in such manner as leaves very little, if anything, in the power of the Speaker.

Sir, it is a strange truth that under the forms of monarchy in Great Britain there is an eternal tendency toward democracy, while under the form of America's democracy there is an eternal drift toward the real spirit of monarchy. That is the literal truth, and any man who will study the record will be profoundly impressed by it.

The Speaker of the English House of Commons has no such power as ours. The Speaker of the French Chamber of Deputies has no such power as ours. The Speaker of the German Reichstag has no such power as ours. Nowhere on the face of the earth has the presiding officer the autocratic power over the deliberations of the body and the course of its legislation which he has here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we say that in the future we express it as our opinion that the House should be organized according to the sense of the House. Decentralize this power which has crept into the hands of the Speaker. Take back to the body of the House this enormous control which year by year has grown into the hands of the Speaker without ever having been voted upon by the people. We have heard it here time and again with a slight approach to monotony of repetition that we are here as a protest against the the czarism of Mr. REED, of the last Congress. Let us admit that that is true.

Mr. REED. Admit that for yourself. Do your own admitting. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I say, Mr. Speaker, let us admit that just as they claim it. Then I make this point upon it, that it is the very first time it was ever brought to the attention of the people; and according to your own statement they said it was a dangerous power. Now, if it is a dangerous power, I do not any more want to give it to a man whose name begins with a C, and who comes from Georgia, than one whose name begins with an R, and who comes from Maine. It is too dangerous a power. Gentlemen have said that we might rely upon the character of the Speaker. God forbid that the political fortunes of this people should ever have to rely upon the mere accident of the character of the Speaker. Let the people retain their own power. Let them take it back to themselves; let them organize the House on true Jeffersonian principles.

This concentration, this usurpation and centralization of power is a curse to commerce, is a curse to politics, and has well-nigh brought this country to its political ruin.

Sir, if I had the power to-day, I would like to draw a picture of just what has been the result of this centralizing of power, in politics, in business, and in production. It has made the large manufacturer absorb the small one. The large railroad has swallowed the small one. The great oil company has swallowed the small one. Trusts and combines absorb or crush individual enterprise. So everywhere centralizing tendencies and usurpative processes are going on, until the power and the money is in the hands of the few, and the people, whether they stand at the doors of cabins in Kansas, or stand at street corners to ask for work in the cities, or stand at the doors of their huts down in dear old Georgia, are utterly deprived of a fair distribution of the very wealth which they create.

Mr. Speaker, out in Kansas the man who feeds the world warms himself by a fire built out of his corn, without having been able to get enough for it to make it cheaper for him to buy coal; down in Georgia the men who made eight million bales of cotton have not been able to save enough of the price to clothe in comfort their wives and their children; and in every city of this land, there are artisans of every sort standing with empty hands, with empty homes, with anxious hearts, asking for work, asking for bread, asking for comfort in a land where, God knows, there is enough for us all.

Mr. FUNSTON. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. WATSON. If it is a correction, the gentleman had better make it in his own speech.

Mr. FUNSTON. I will say to the gentleman that corn in Kansas is now worth 50 cents a bushel; that we have several million bushels of it for sale; we are not burning corn instead of coal; and there is no calamity party there now.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman in his own time can make a statement of his own views and the facts upon which they are based; but if the gentleman means to say that the corn-raisers of Kansas are not in a destitute and deplorable condition, and have not been burning their own corn, and reading the rule nisi foreclosing his mortgage by the light of such a fire—then he certainly contradicts the very strong testimony upon which my assertion was founded.

Mr. FUNSTON. It is not true.

Mr. WATSON. By men who have seen these fires burning.

Mr. FUNSTON. It is not true.

Mr. WATSON. Now, let me beg of the gentleman to hold his potato. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I got a letter from Georgia by mail this morning, and I beg this House to hear me read one paragraph. It is from Burke County, and is written to me by W. C. Sandeford, as intelligent and honorable a man as lives, president of the Burke County Farmers' Alliance. Listen to what I find in that letter:

Our country is in a terrible, terrible condition. Out of fifteen hundred customers at one store only fourteen paid out; five hundred paid less than 50 cents on the dollar.

And I may remark, Mr. Speaker, that that was after the mules, the horses, the cotton, and the corn were brought in and given up.

He says further:

I had a sad experience that I wish every member of the Fifty-second Congress could have had.

Listen to this, gentlemen of the Fifty-second Congress:

A very poor but good man's child had died. He went 16 miles to the merchant who furnished him—

And if any of you know anything about Southern weather for the last few months, you know he went through sleet and snow—

He went 16 miles to the merchant who furnished him, and told him he wanted a coffin. Without reply the merchant turned to the poor man's account: "Mr. B., I am sorry, but you are already ahead of your 'limit,' and we can not let you have it." "What am I to do," he remonstrated. "Well," said the merchant, seemingly worried and impatient, "damn it, put it in a box."

Mr. Speaker, my correspondent says he does not blame the merchant for not letting the man have the credit, but—

I only blame the merchant for the unkind way of refusing.

I, too, gentlemen, do not blame him for not giving credit, but I do blame him for the harshness of the reply.

Touch with the sacred fire of inspiration, O, Master Divine, the lips of the best orator of this House, and let him speak to this Congress of the miseries of the people; but he will fail to touch the hearts of his hearers as they will be touched by the silent appeal which death has written upon the frozen lips of the uncoffined child.

Sir, I know that what I have said here to-day may be utterly thrown away. I am not addressing so much this Congress as I am addressing the future. But through the hurried pencil of these stenographers I will reach the hearts of the American people; through the fingers of every reporter in the galleries I will reach the American people, and we expect to stir them up all along the line, until from Maine to Georgia, and from the Lakes to the Gulf, they will ask to have this Government rededicated to the old Jeffersonian principle.

Mr. Speaker, what is the essence of it? Its essence is that grand truth enunciated by Abraham Lincoln when he stood at Gettysburg, with words to encourage the living and to commemorate the dead, sun-lit by a broad patriotism, which made him brave enough to say to the man who remarked, "I am proud to be a fellow-countryman of the soldiers who held these heights." "Yes, and I am glad to be a fellow-countryman of the soldiers who attacked those heights." On that memorable battlefield he asked that this Government might be dedicated again to its original principles. We ask no more. We ask that much. We insist upon that much. We insist that this Government shall be again brought back to its foundations, so that it may be a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." [Applause.]

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). The gentleman from Georgia has ten minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. WATSON. I will reserve that for the present.

Mr. REED was recognized.

Mr. REED. I yield twenty minutes to my colleague, Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House back to the question which is really under consideration. The House is engaged in framing a code of rules, under the authority granted by the Constitution, for the purpose of enabling it to transact the business which is committed to it. The Committee on Rules have made a report, and I take it that before we complete the consideration of that report the real question which will divide the House—not on party lines at all, but as to the proper methods of transacting public business—will be simply this: Shall the majority of the House be intrusted by the rules with the selection, from the business which has been reported by the appropriate committee and placed upon the Calendars, of that which is to be considered by the House; or shall that selection be intrusted to three gentlemen composing a majority of the Committee on Rules? That, and the additional, but in some respects more important, question as to whether appropriation bills shall be open to legislative "riders" are the real questions that are before the House.

In all parliamentary bodies, and in this House from necessity, more than any other parliamentary body, all business brought up for consideration must and should be first considered and reported by the several committees intrusted with the subjects which have been given in their charge. There is no difference of opinion upon that point. No legislative proposition can come before this House for action until it has been considered and reported by the appropriate committee. Having been reported and referred to one of the three Calendars, namely, the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or the House Calendar (these two covering the public business), or the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole for private bills, then the real question is, How shall the selection be made from these Calendars of the measures that are to be considered by the House?

In the first place, I ask gentlemen to bear in mind that there is this difficulty staring us in the face in the House of Representatives that is not encountered in any ordinary legislative body. In State Legislatures, when matters have been reported and placed upon the appropriate calendars, the business is not of so large a volume but that the house and the senate (if the legislative body consists of two houses) may take up and consider every measure so reported and placed upon their calendars. Now, if it were true that we could do that in this House the question that is presented by these rules would not have arisen. But the country is so large and the volume of business to be transacted is so extensive, that it is absolutely impossible for this House to consider more than a fraction of the bills and resolutions which have been favorably reported by committees and placed upon our several Calendars.

Not 10 per cent of the public bills which have been reported and placed upon the Calendars can be taken up and considered by this House. Now, given this situation, who shall select that 10 per cent of the business on the Calendars? That is the real question before the House. The Committee on Rules have practically said—and I will endeavor to show this before I sit down—that the gentlemen who shall select from the public Calendars the 10 per cent of business which can be considered by this House shall be the three members constituting the majority of the Committee on Rules. There is no doubt about that, gentlemen.

I have sat in this House session after session under precisely the code that is proposed here, and I say to you, and you will agree with me at the end of the session if the rules shall be adopted as they have been reported, that practically, not the 167 members constituting a majority of this House, but the three gentlemen constituting a majority of the Committee on Rules, are given the sole authority to select the 10 per cent of the bills and resolutions reported and placed on the Calendars which shall be considered. Now, Mr. Speaker, I object to that on principle. I hold that no parliamentary body should voluntarily adopt rules which commit to any three gentlemen, I do not care how able or how honest they may be, the exclusive determination of the question of what business shall be even considered by the body. I say the exclusive determination, because it is entirely proper that the Committee on Rules should have the right to report a special rule for the consideration of any business that they think should be considered, provided the majority of the House shall at the same time have the right themselves to take up any measure upon the public Calendars which they desire to consider.

Now, you ask me how it is proposed under the rules which have been reported to practically commit this matter to three gentlemen on the Committee on Rules. It is proposed, in the first place, that all the bills which have been reported and been placed on the several Calendars shall be taken up in their regular order, revenue and appropriation bills excepted. That is the only way in which they can be taken up under the proposed rules. Here are a thousand bills on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The least important bills are those first reported always. The bills which constitute the really important business of the House are reported at a later stage of the session. Now, when the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under the rules as proposed, it will not have the power of selecting the particular measures that it will consider, but it must consider the different measures on the Calendar in their order, the least important coming first. No important measure can be or ever was reached in this House by considering the Calendar in regular order.

But the majority of the Committee on Rules have taken particular care that nothing of importance should be reached in that way—how? They have provided that when the first bill on the Calendar is read in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, not that the committee shall at once decide whether the bill shall be laid aside or not—that might give a chance to reach something; but they have provided that this bill, which is of no consequence, shall not be laid aside until the Committee of the Whole rises and goes back to the House and determines whether it shall be laid aside; and then a single gentleman may, perhaps, interpose filibustering motions to prevent the laying aside of that bill, and upon such motion the yeas and nays may be demanded. Every gentleman who has been in this House for years understands that under such a process as that no bill can be reached for consideration by the majority of this House. It can not be done; it never has been done.

Now, I propose right at that point to offer an amendment to the reported rules, providing that the committee without rising, and of course without a yea-and-nay vote (the House being in Committee of the Whole), may lay aside any bill as it is reached, and so lay aside bill after bill until the measure which the House desires to consider shall be reached.

But that is not all; I propose by an amendment which I shall offer to give the House the right to decide, when the motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole, what bill on the Calendar it will consider. Suppose there is a bill relating to a most important matter, but which may be almost the last bill on the Calendar. It can not be reached in the regular order. I propose that the committee which reported the bill shall have authority when they make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to also move the particular bill to be considered; and then if the 167 members constituting a majority of this House want to reach and consider that bill they can do so.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. First, let me state that if this authority to designate in the motion to go into Committee of the Whole the particular bill to be considered is to be exercised by one committee it must necessarily be given to other committees. This being the case, does not the gentleman think that under such a system as he proposes the time of the House would, upon a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, be largely consumed in a scramble of the different committees for the precedence of business?

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, sir, we can judge——

Mr. McMILLIN. The motion that the gentleman contemplates would be subject to amendment?

Mr. DINGLEY. It would be subject to one amendment under the rules.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then you would have your motion to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider the particular bill, and you would have a second motion to amend by inserting another bill——

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely.

Mr. McMILLIN. And upon those motions there would be the possibility of two votes by yeas and nays before the question of going into the Committee of the Whole could be determined.

Mr. DINGLEY. But there could be only two yea-and-nay votes before the bill would be reached.

Mr. McMILLIN. What better means of filibustering could be desired?

Mr. DINGLEY. But I would have the power to filibuster taken away. Let me say that we had precisely such a rule in the last House, and there was never, except on one occasion, any attempt to delay the proceedings of the House upon a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMILLIN. But does not my friend remember—and it bears upon the point now under discussion—that in the last Congress seventeen successive Fridays assigned by the rules to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar were taken up by other business?

Mr. DINGLEY. That has nothing to do with this matter. The House must always have the right to determine whether it will go on with public or private business on Fridays.

Mr. McMILLIN. But when the House determined that it would not consider——

Mr. DINGLEY. I must object to having my time further taken up in this way.

Mr. McMILLIN. I beg pardon of the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. I must proceed. In another direction (in regard to which I propose to offer an amendment to which I invite the attention of the House) measures have been taken in this report to strangle the will of the majority with respect to the transaction of business. Suppose a bill has passed this House, and, going to the Senate, has there been slightly amended, the amendment not involving any expenditure of money; it may be simply the correction of a name—no matter how slight. Now, the rules reported by this committee provide that when a bill which has passed the House, been amended by the Senate, and returned here, it shall be referred to a committee instead of being taken up for consideration of the amendment. And when referred to a committee and reported back, what becomes of it?

It goes to the foot of the Calendar, and can not be reached during the session except by unanimous consent or through a report of the Committee on Rules.

Now, I ask gentlemen of the House if they propose to adopt a rule which will take away from 167 members of this body the right even to consider a bill which has been passed by the House and sent to the Senate and returned with a slight amendment, but which will send the bill back to the committee and to the foot of the Calendar to slumber for the session unless it can be taken up either by unanimous consent or by the will of the three gentlemen composing the majority of the Committee on Rules, who may choose to bring in a rule to enable it to be taken up? When that rule is reached I propose to offer the rule of the last Congress, which permits such a bill to be taken up and finally disposed of.

Why, gentlemen, when you come to examine these rules and see just what is proposed you must be convinced that the 167 members composing the majority of this House have been relegated to the rear, and the three gentlemen who compose the majority of the Committee on Rules are undertaking to decide for themselves what shall be considered in this body.

More than that, sir, every one familiar with the transaction of business here will understand that under another rule proposed by the committee which admits of filibustering—the alternating of the two motions to adjourn, and fix a day to which the House will adjourn—it is in the power of a single member of the House to defeat any measure against which he sees fit to use these motions. This we all understand who have been here for many years.

Now, the gentlemen who have reported this rule do not propose to lessen the power of filibustering at all against any measure that 167 members may want, or which may come before the House, but simply to stop filibustering when they report a resolution to consider a measure which they desire to pass.

I shall offer amendments reaching these provisions of the rules that deprive the House of its legitimate power when we come to consider this report by sections. Let me recapitulate: First, under the rules reported by the committee it is impossible for a majority of this House to go into the Committee of the Whole and select the bill for itself which they will consider. Secondly, it is impossible for a majority of this House to take up and consider a bill which has passed the House, been sent to the Senate, and returned with a slight amendment. Such a bill is relegated to the foot of the Calendar. And, thirdly, if there be any opportunity for the House to take up a measure which is not agreeable to any two or three gentlemen on the floor they may filibuster against it and defeat it unless the bill has been protected against filibustering by a report of the Committee on Rules. That is the position in which the report of the majority of the Committee on Rules places the House.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen shall thoroughly understand these rules and the practical issue which is involved in this matter. It is not, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] stated a few minutes ago, a question as to whether the Speaker shall decide the order of business or the three gentlemen of the Committee on Rules shall so decide, but whether 167 members of this body shall be able to reach a bill they want to reach, or whether it shall be committed exclusively to the three members of the Committee on Rules to determine for them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should be very glad to occupy a few minutes longer to discuss another branch of this subject.

Mr. REED. I yield to my colleague ten minutes longer.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to have consumed a little further time upon the points I have been discussing, but I must pass to another, as I desire to call the attention of the House to the most mischievous rule that has been proposed to the House since it was laid aside in the Forty-ninth Congress, and that is the rule suggested by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the rule that admits of new legislation, or legislative riders, upon appropriation bills, provided on the face of such measures they seem to reduce expenditures.

Now, Mr. Speaker, every one understands that it does not require any very great ingenuity to frame a proposition or amendment upon any imaginable subject to accomplish any imaginable end, and make it appear upon its face to reduce expenditures, thus bringing it within the rule, especially if there is placed in the chair of the Committee of the Whole a gentleman who desires to have the matter brought before the House.

An appropriation bill, in all legislative bodies that are properly conducted, is simply a bill providing for appropriations already authorized by law, and any attempt to fasten new legislation upon an appropriation bill, under whatever guise, is an attempt to drag in new issues not involved in the question of appropriations, which, with the controversies that may arise out of it, may eventually defeat the appropriations themselves and endanger the existence of the Government.

There is no principle, it seems to me, in parliamentary procedure, wiser than the rule of confining appropriation bills to objects already authorized by law and necessary for the maintenance of the Government. For these propositions are of such a character that although questions may arise respecting the amount to be appropriated, yet no question can arise as to the propriety of making the appropriation in some amount for the purpose of supporting the Government. But when a rider involving another legislative proposition, new legislation, is proposed, then you introduce into the consideration of an appropriation bill a new feature, which not only in the House but also in the Senate may create such differences of sentiment as to involve the ultimate defeat of the bill, and involve even the safety of the Government itself.

Mr. Speaker, it was in the Forty-fourth Congress that the legislative rider was intrenched in the form of a rule, and it continued until the Forty-ninth Congress. But so general was the feeling against it in that Democratic Congress (the Forty-ninth), that the House, under the lead of the distinguished Speaker at that time, the honorable Mr. Carlisle, by a vote of 205 to 69, struck out the Holman rider rule, and left appropriation bills simply to cover appropriations already authorized by law. I remember, Mr. Speaker, sitting in this House in the Forty-ninth Congress and listening to that very instructive debate. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], now in this House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], now in this House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Morrison], now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and other distinguished Democratic leaders whom I might name, led off in opposition to the legislative rider, declaring that it would be sure to bring contentions into Congress which might imperil the Government. If that rule is to be placed in the code of rules to govern this House, I predict that not July nor August nor September will witness the close of this session.

Such will be the questions that will be dragged in, entirely outside of the questions of appropriation for the support of the Government, that week after week and month after month will be occupied in the conflicts invited by attempting to foist partisan legislation into appropriation bills. I beg of you, before you shall reëstablish a rule which the Democratic House of the Forty-ninth Congress with such unanimity condemned and struck out of the rules, to seriously consider what you are doing. I remember very well the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] on that occasion, in which they pointed out to their Democratic colleagues that no advantage could possibly be gained by the adoption of such a rule.

I recollect very well their saying to their colleagues that if there was any necessity or any desire on their part to reduce expenditures lower than authorized by law, to abolish any offices, or to amend the laws in any direction, it should be brought in as a separate proposition and sent to the Senate; and then the Senate, as they said, if the measure was right, would be held to due responsibility in rejecting it. "But," added they, "if you put such new legislation upon appropriation bills, then instead of holding the Senate to any responsibility they will be indorsed by the country in rejecting it, not upon the ground of the propriety of the measure itself, but upon the ground that it was a rider upon an appropriation bill, and you will lose all that might be gained by bringing these measures separately before the House."

Open up the selection of business to be transacted by the House to the 167 gentlemen comprising a majority; let them take up each measure as they desire to, and in whatever direction they amend the laws, repeal them, or take such other steps as they may see fit, let each measure stand on its own merits, and not endeavor to link them with the simple duty of appropriating means to carry on the Government. I very well remember, when the yeas and nays were taken upon the adoption of the Holman amendment, that of the gentlemen on the Democratic side who are members of the present House the following were recorded against the Holman rider: Mr. BLAND of Missouri, Mr. BLOUNT of Georgia, Mr. C. R. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas, Mr. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, Mr. BYNUM of Indiana, Mr. CATCHINGS of Mississippi, Mr. DOCKERY of Missouri, Mr. HATCH of Missouri, Mr. HERBERT of Alabama, Mr. MILLS of Texas, Mr. Morrison of Illinois, Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri, Mr. OUTHWAITE of Ohio, Mr. STAHLNECKER of New York, Mr. STONE of Kentucky, Mr. Stone of Missouri, Mr. Tucker of Virginia (not now a member of the House), Mr. WISE of Virginia, and many others.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask that the Clerk read the rule which I have offered as an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, as Rule XI, to be inserted next after the rule defining the duties and powers of committees, the following:

"It shall be the duty of the several committees having jurisdiction of the general appropriation bills to report said appropriation bills (except the general deficiency bill) within eighty days after the committees are announced in a long session, and within forty days after the commencement of a short session; and if any committee fail to so report, the reasons of such failure shall be privileged for consideration when called for by any member of the House."

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I offer this rule in the interest of economy and that the sessions of Congress may be shortened, and in order that every member of this House may have time in which to examine general appropriation bills that take from the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars. This is not a new regulation. As far back as 1837 a rule was adopted in the House of Representatives in many respects similar to the rule which I now offer and that rule had the indorsement of twenty-one Congresses and remained in the rules of the House of Representatives for forty-two years. I am not able to tell now why that rule was omitted when the rules were revised in 1880, but I know that prior to that time sessions of Congress were much shorter than they are now and appropriation bills were reported much earlier and the respective amounts appropriated were much smaller. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may have proper knowledge of appropriations made in the House of Representatives for the support of the Government it will be necessary to give a brief history of the manner in which general appropriation bills have been controlled by the rules of the House.

During the first forty years of the existence of our Government all general appropriations were made each year in an act entitled, "An act making appropriations for the support of the Government."

In 1823 appropriations for fortifications, and in 1826 appropriations for pensions, were first made in separate bills.

In 1844 the first separate act for Post-Office and general deficiency appropriation bills was passed.

In 1847 the appropriations were first made in nine separate bills, as follows: Army, civil and diplomatic, deficiency, fortifications, Indians, Military Academy, Navy, pensions, and Post-Office, and all were reported by the Ways and Means Committee. There was no Appropriations Committee at that time.

In 1862 the sundry civil bill was authorized, and in 1880 the agricultural appropriation bill, and in the same session the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Up to 1865 there was no Committee on Appropriations in this House, and members may think from the power now given to the Committee on Appropriations and the authority that committee has in this House that it is one of the oldest committees of the House of Representatives. But that is not so.

For eighty years of the existence of our Government there was no Appropriations Committee. In 1865 (second session, Thirty-eighth Congress) a new rule was adopted creating the Committee on Appropriations, and then the general appropriation bills were taken from the Committee on Ways and Means and given to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee had jurisdiction of all appropriation bills until 1885, and then seven of the great appropriation bills of this House were taken from the Committee on Appropriations and distributed as follows:

The Army appropriation bill was given to the Committee on Military Affairs; the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill was given to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; the Indian appropriation bill was given to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the Military Academy appropriation bill was given to the Committee on Military Affairs; the naval appropriation bill was given to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the Post-Office appropriation bill was given to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the Agricultural appropriation bill was given to the Committee on Agriculture.

The Committee on Appropriations has since 1885 had charge of the following bills: Deficiencies, District of Columbia, fortifications; legislative, executive, and judicial; pensions, and the sundry civil appropriation bills.

It was on September 14, 1837, the first session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, when the House of Representatives adopted the following rule:

> It shall be the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means within thirty days after their appointment at every session of Congress, commencing the first Monday of December, to report the general appropriation bills.

Thus we see that when the Committee on Ways and Means had jurisdiction of these great appropriation bills they were compelled by a rule of this House to report those appropriation bills within thirty days after the committees were appointed, and, in 1865, when the Appropriation Committee was created, there was an amendment made to that rule by adding the following:

> Or on a failure therein, the reasons for such failure, and said Committee on Appropriations shall have leave to report such bills at any time.

The rule now proposed restores the old rule and enlarges the time in which committees in charge of appropriation bills shall report them to eighty days in a long session and forty days in a short session. This is made necessary by increased appropriations and by the additional work required of the committees.

Under such a salutary rule general appropriation bills could not be withheld, as they have notoriously been for many years, until the closing hours of the session and then either run through with great haste under the apprehension of a called session or passed under a suspension of the rules with little or no debate or examination by members, or perhaps hundreds of Senate amendments, involving millions of dollars, sent to a committee of conference, consisting of three members, whose report is usually accepted without question.

That we may see the difference in the time of reporting and passing general appropriation bills twenty years ago, when a rule was in force substantially the same as the one now under consideration, I call the attention of members to a comparison I will now make, showing that twenty years ago general appropriation bills were usually reported in January and February of each year, and now they are reported as late as June, July, and August, and but little time allowed for consideration and discussion.

In the Fortieth Congress the House of Representatives met on the first Monday in December, 1867, and the Army appropriation bill was reported in February, 1868, the consular and diplomatic bill was reported February 10, the Indian appropriation bill on February 28, the Military Academy bill on January 31, the naval appropriation bill on January 31, the pension appropriation bill on February 7, the Post-Office appropriation bill on February 20, and the sundry civil appropriation bill on February 25. All these appropriation bills were reported at the regular session of the Fortieth Congress in January and February.

In the Forty-second Congress the Army appropriation bill was reported on February 14, 1872, the consular and diplomatic bill on January 29, the general deficiency bill on February 19, the fortification appropriation bill on February 29, the Indian appropriation bill on January 26, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill January 26, the Military Academy appropriation bill on February 21, the naval appropriation bill on January 25, the pension appropriation bill on January 18, and the Post-Office appropriation bill on January 18. The rule at that time required the general appropriation bills to be reported within the first thirty days after the announcement of the committees, or failing to so report the committee should give a reason for the delay.

Now, let us see what has been the practice since 1880, when the rule was omitted. I will not take up the time of the House by going into details, but I will simply call attention to the fact that in the Forty-seventh Congress, which was the first Congress after the rule was omitted, four of the great appropriation bills were reported to the House in June, two in July, and one in August. In the Forty-eighth Congress four of the great appropriation bills were reported in June and one in July. In the Forty-ninth Congress two of the great appropriation bills were reported to the House in July, two in June, and one in May.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCREARY. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] to give me a few minutes more.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. In the first session of the Fiftieth Congress five of the great appropriation bills passed the House of Representatives in June and two in August; and in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress four of the general appropriation bills passed the House of Representatives in June. Mr. Speaker, I think this record shows conclusively that there ought to be a rule requiring general appropriation bills to be reported to this House for its consideration in the early months of the session. Additional reasons are that ill-advised and bad legislation sometimes come in upon these bills when they are reported so near the close of a session.

The House of Representatives originates the appropriation bills, and it is our duty to send them to the Senate in time for that body to consider them with the care and deliberation they deserve. These appropriation bills, after they have passed the House and the Senate, have to go to the President; he should also have proper time to examine and consider them. It is an open secret that Mr. Cleveland refused to sign two general appropriation bills because they went to him the day before the Congress adjourned and he had not time to examine them.

It is also a matter of common information that within the last fifteen years general appropriation bills have passed the House and the Senate when it was too late to enroll them properly, and when the Committee on Enrolled Bills had not sufficient time to compare the enrolled bills with the originals, and the result has been that serious mistakes have been made. Mr. Speaker, there is in the rules reported by the committee, and which will probably pass, a provision that hereafter new legislation may be placed upon general appropriation bills, and this furnishes an additional reason, and makes it more important perhaps now than ever before, that these appropriation bills should be reported early enough for the House to consider them with due care and deliberation. In the rule which I have proposed it is provided that after the time allowed has passed any committee having charge of a general appropriation bill may obtain further time by reporting a satisfactory reason for delay in reporting the bill.

The best test of any system of rules or laws is the application of them and the experience we have had under them.

The rules of the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses were in many respects satisfactory, and I am glad the committee has reported them for the government of the Fifty-second Congress. I think with some modifications and amendments they will be regarded as wise and just and fair.

The rules of the Fifty-first Congress I regarded as aiding and encouraging parliamentary tyranny and making legislative monstrosities possible.

Under those rules an oppressive and burdensome tariff bill was passed after only a few hours' debate. An audacious, arbitrary, dangerous, and unconstitutional bill commonly called "the force bill," was passed under the operation of the previous question, with but little discussion, and bills reorganizing United States courts and establishing new law on silver coinage and other important measures were passed in unprecedented haste and with but limited debate.

I thank the Divinity which controls the destinies of men as well as of nations that the Representatives in Congress are not the sovereigns, but the servants of the people, and retributive justice is sure and certain. A political revolution convulsed the United States at the last Congressional election. An earthquake seems to shake up the Republican party, and the party which had a majority of 24 in the last Congress now occupies hardly one-third of the seats in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic party has a great mission to perform. Its mission is to revise and reduce taxation so that there will be equal rights for all and special privileges to none. Its mission is to benefit the business interests of the country by increasing the volume of money. Its mission is to strike down and destroy trusts and combines, which enrich classes and impoverish the masses. Its mission is to restore economy, justice, and fair play. It will be certain to accomplish its mission.

I am opposed to one-man power on the floor or in the Speaker's chair. With fair, just, and wise rules for our government we can move on with harmony and diligence, I trust, to perform the important duties required at this session of Congress.

I believe the adoption of the rule which I have been advocating will be a long step in favor of economy, and that it will be in the interest of short sessions, and give every member of this House proper time to examine bills which are of great importance to us and to the country.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM].

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I think it must be very evident to members of this House that we must have some set of rules before we can do very much business. During the last session of Congress there were introduced into this House more than 14,300 bills. There were also introduced 289 joint resolutions. There were introduced into the Senate 5,130 bills, making an aggregate in the two Houses of about 19,500 bills and resolutions. Now, if we calculate the time required for the consideration of these measures, allowing only ten minutes for each bill or resolution, there would be required for their consideration 633⅓ days. It is very apparent, therefore, that a system of rules somewhat rigid and somewhat arbitrary is absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of the business of this House. I am therefore in favor, in the main, of the rules reported by the committee. I believe they can be improved by some amendments, but in the main they embrace the aggregated wisdom of previous Congresses.

I am not alarmed, as the minority in this House appears to be, by the fear that dangerous power may be lodged in the hands of the Committee on Rules. To a certain extent there must be an arbitrary power lodged somewhere. It is perfectly apparent that the large number of bills and resolutions introduced here can never receive consideration during any Congress. If we should sit here from the time of our election until our successors are elected and qualified we could not duly consider one-half of the measures that are brought before us. Therefore, in the formation of our rules it is necessary that important measures, necessary legislation, should take precedence of all other measures, and I am in favor of granting necessary bills privilege of consideration. I am not in favor of going to the extent of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], and conferring privilege upon any measure not absolutely necessary to carry on the Government.

The question therefore recurs whether, by the proposed rules, we confer an extraordinary and dangerous power upon the Committee on Rules. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that when our Calendars are made up there are certain important bills which can not be reached without some special order. Therefore, it frequently happens that a resolution is introduced in the House and sent to the Committee on Rules to determine whether a particular bill should be taken up out of order. To this extent, Mr. Speaker, there is an arbitrary power lodged in the Committee on Rules, because that committee has the power to report or not to report such a proposition. How can we remedy this evil, because to a certain extent it appears to be an evil? Can we permit every member of this House to put before that Committee on Rules propositions for special orders and make them privileged? If you do that, you will sit here until doomsday without obtaining the consideration of any measure.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to trust the Committee on Rules, three members constituting a majority of that committee, or five members including the minority. I am willing to trust their judgment and their discretion as to the determination of what measures should have precedence in this House. Such a power must be lodged somewhere. The Committee on Rules can be trusted to comply with the demands of a majority of this House.

Mr. Speaker, we know the difficulties that have attended the progress of legislation in this House, and we know full well the opposition that was aroused during the Fiftieth Congress to the old rules. In this House, during that Congress, one man stood here for a whole week filibustering, not against any particular measure, but against the transaction of any legislation, because a bill in which he felt a deep interest was not given a day by the Committee on Rules. By reason of this proceeding on his part a compromise was necessary with that single member, the Committee on Rules agreeing that the measure which he desired to have considered should be brought forward.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think such a power of obstruction should be conferred upon any member. I do not believe that it ought to be within the power of any member to block legislation because his whims have not been satisfied as to measures which are to have precedence. Hence I propose to offer an amendment to section 4 of Rule XVI which will prevent anything of that kind, leaving in the hands of the House greater power to determine and to transact such legislation as may be brought forward.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish now to go over the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that in a measure the Speaker of this House must be clothed with a certain authority——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. What is the amendment which the gentleman proposes to offer?

Mr. BYNUM. It is to strike out the provision that a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn and a motion to take a recess shall be in order at any time, limiting the privilege simply to the motion to adjourn, which can not be repeated at the same stage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the difference between the rules of the last Congress and those proposed in this Congress is very marked. Under the rules as reported, without the amendment I have suggested, it would be in the power of one man to prohibit or stop any legislation that he did not indorse.

Under the rules of the last Congress it was within the power of one man to enact legislation. That is the difference; one man under the system of rules existing prior to last Congress could block legislation, while one man under the rules of the last House was clothed with power and authority to legislate for the entire body. That power was conferred upon him by the rules, whether constitutionally or not I shall not say. The rule which authorized him to record upon the Journal the names of members not voting enabled him to pass bills for which the members were not responsible in their legislative capacity.

Mr. Speaker, we can not undertake in the reformation of this system of rules to do more than to free the hands of the members of this House as far as practicable and to enable them to transact business in the best way possible, because we can not transact one-half or one-quarter of the legislation that will be presented during the session for our consideration. I believe, therefore, that the power lodged in the Committee on Rules in the proposed code must necessarily and properly be lodged there, and I am willing to trust that committee to bring before the House such measures of relief as the people desire or that may be deemed necessary by a majority of this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WATSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, as a new member of this House I rise with considerable diffidence before this magnificent audience and in your presence, and my first remark will be to thank this great majority for the privilege of allowing me to appear and for according rights such as have been accorded to a small minority. It has not always been so in the history of this Congress. My memory goes back to the fifties, when it was not accorded, and to the eighties, when it was not accorded willingly. But now it is accorded and accorded very willingly. And though we claim this hearing as a right, yet when men have the privilege of doing wrong and still do right, I for one feel like thanking them for it.

We have, Mr. Speaker, virtually three sets of rules before the House for its consideration. One of these sets grants to the Speaker of the House what one party says are inordinate, unusual, and unjust powers with the minority, while the other grants what the other side claims are also inordinate and unjust powers. The third code, however, proposes that the business of this House shall be, as far as possible, controlled by the entire sentiment of the House itself, by submitting it to the continual revision of a committee composed of one man from each State and Territory, who shall be elected and selected by the House itself. That committee on revision, so constituted, is to bring forward certain business that may be more important ahead of other business of less importance. That is the committee on revision, and they should meet at least once or twice a month.

Leaving that now for the present, and turning my attention in another direction—for my time is limited—I desire to say that I have before me, Mr. Speaker, a most unusual spectacle. I have on my right hand a minority arguing for rules that will put inordinate, unusual, and, they claim, unjust powers in the hands of an opposition Speaker, while on my left I have a very large majority of the House arguing for rules that will put the same power in the hands of this minority. Now, just how to reconcile these differences will take, I apprehend, some thought. [Laughter.] Each side wants to grant to the other greater powers, and each side, with unusual diffidence, pushes the powers that are presented to them aside and declares, "We won't undertake to exercise them."

Now, I have studied this question considerably and tried to understand it; and, Mr. Speaker, I can only understand it in the light of some good old orthodox authority. My first impression is that there is no difference between the two wings of the old parties on my right and left. In the first place, this minority is perfectly willing to intrust legislation in the hands of what they call an opposition Speaker, for they know that all great questions of finance, transportation, public lands, taxation, etc., are equally important in the mind of any Speaker, no matter what you may call his party. But, on the other hand, this majority, in regard to all these great questions, are willing to trust almost autocratic authority in the hands of the other fellows.

I do not speak at random. I have before me a very orthodox authority on the Republican side, a book written by Mr. Andrew Carnegie. I think he is a Republican. He says he is a Republican of the high-tariff protection kind. But he says;

Rather than have free coinage of silver, I would vote for the lowest tariff Democrat.

That looks as if he was almost there.

Mr. Carnegie further says:

A politician may safely be challenged to state wherein the Democratic and Republican parties of to-day differ. If one of the "outs," he will say that the "ins," having had control too long, have become corrupt, and that, as a new broom sweeps clean, a change is desirable. But ask him which, if any, of the national laws or forms he would change, and he is dumb.

Then, after arguing that question through three or four pages, this orthodox authority says further:

As before explained, the "outs" must accuse the "ins "of corruption, since the policy of one party is that of the other.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say one word more. I desire to quote one more authority before I sit down. I quote from my predecessor [Mr. Anderson of Kansas] in a speech made on the floor of this House during his last term:

It does not appear that the control of this floor by either of the political parties makes an earthly bit of difference on the banking question. When you gentlemen on the Democratic side had control of the House one of the first bills reported by your committee was this bill, and we have it here now from a Republican committee, and it is just the same old bill again. [Laughter.]

In the line of this testimony I desire to add in conclusion that in the Kansas elections of November, 1891, the Democratic and Republican parties held joint conventions, and nominated and supported joint tickets against the People's party in many parts of the State. So, Mr. Speaker, the indications both East and West seem to point to a union of the old parties into a single organization in order to defeat the coming party of the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I also wish to thank both Republicans and Democrats for the courtesy with which they have treated us, the People's party, in Congress. Therefore, I am satisfied with the present rules. I do not see any necessity for changing them. It seems to me that we have been able heretofore to conduct the business of this House without any set of ironclad rules. We have had a hearing; I doubt if we get that in the future. There have been a few gentlemen who sought to interrupt us. My auburn-haired friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] sometimes has thought that we have said something that might result to the detriment of the Republican party, and my good friend from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON], the last almost of a great party [laughter], has endeavored to enlighten this House in regard to the price of corn in the great State of Kansas. He says that it is 55 cents a bushel, when I read in the New York papers that it only sold for 48½ cents in New York yesterday and 37½ cents in Kansas City.

Mr. FUNSTON. I made no such statement whatever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not yield. I have the floor now and the gentleman may have it later. This only goes to show how much the Republican members from Kansas know about Kansas. [Laughter.] I say, sir, that this gentleman has been posing as a farmer, the representative of the agricultural class, and he stands up here to-day and tells us that corn is 55 cents a bushel in Kansas, when as a matter of fact he can buy millions of bushels at 30 cents.

Mr. FUNSTON. I made no such statement.

Mr. SIMPSON. There is a curious coincidence in connection with this question. It is this; that as the number of the Republican Representatives from Kansas has decreased, the price of corn has gone up in Kansas. [Laughter.] Since the People's party there has begun to rule, the price not only of corn but of nearly every other product of the farm has advanced; and I think it is as well, when the great party that once stood for the rights and liberties of the people has now degenerated into the hands and control of men who know so little about the necessities of the country as my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON], I think it is time that some other party should take its place.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to these rules, it is a strange spectacle to me that the members of Congress who represent the people, who have been delegated with power to carry on legislation, should come down here and delegate away their powers to the Committee on Rules. That is the point, gentlemen, and it is one of grave importance to us. I come here representing my constituents from one of the largest districts of Kansas, having within the borders of that district a population of 300,000 people, or thereabouts. Our interests have been neglected in this House heretofore. For thirty years past I defy any gentleman on the right or on the left to point to one law that has been passed in the interest of the farmers or laborers of this country. Point to one single law, I ask any gentleman either on the right hand or on the left. I am here as a protest against this neglect of this large mass of people, and I desire a chance to put measures before this House that this class of people wish to have enacted into law. Therefore, I do not want to delegate the power to a committee who can put the gag upon us; but I want to say to the Congressmen here who represent the people that they should leave themselves free so that they can pass laws that will relieve the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON].

Mr. FUNSTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat amused with my colleagues from Kansas and others claiming to belong to what they call the "People's party." During the last week or two they have been making a remarkable exhibition of themselves; it seems that they do not all agree; and now I would advise them to retire behind the barn, settle upon some political doctrine, and present it here to this House, and stand by it.

Mr. SIMPSON. We have all agreed that you do not know the price of corn. [Laughter.]

Mr. FUNSTON. Now, you find one gentleman lauding the principles of the Republican party, another lauding the principles of the Democratic party, and others of them getting on the fence, bowing to both sides of the House. [Laughter.] But I must say that the gentleman from the western district of Kansas, before me, who has just taken his seat [Mr. SIMPSON], has shown the nerve of a true representative and the true position of the party he represents, for we know them in my State to belong to a party that is opposed to the Republican party only.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is right.

Mr. FUNSTON. We charged them with being Democrats, and they denied that; but the gentleman before me on the 21st instant made a speech in which he went bag and baggage, boots, saddle, horse, and all into the Democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARUTH. We are glad to take him in.

Mr. FUNSTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to him that while he surrenders himself to the Democratic party he should bear in mind that he surrenders not only his magnificent self [laughter], but he surrenders the great People's party that he represents. Yes, I want to say to my colleague from Kansas, when you deliver yourself over into the lap of this Democratic Delilah [laughter], who will take and nurse you on her knees while she shears you of your locks, be careful that she does not also get from you that other article on which you won your way to Congress. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman unintentionally misrepresented me when I corrected the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. WISE. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FUNSTON. The gentleman from Georgia, when he said that corn was burned in Kansas. I said that there was not a word of truth in it. I do not believe there was ever a bushel of corn burned in Kansas, and I said to-day it is selling at 40 cents a bushel.

Several MEMBERS. Fifty cents.

Mr. FUNSTON. Well, gentlemen state, I understand, that I said 50 cents. If I did so, I correct it most cheerfully, and state that I meant to say 40 cents.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is neither this way nor that. I say that these gentlemen have come here, not by making speeches upon great political principles, but by an appeal to the prejudices of the people of their States, making them believe that they were burning corn and starving to death at the same time.

Mr. CARUTH. They can not tell corn from coal.

Mr. FUNSTON. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have millions of bushels of corn for sale in Kansas, and I myself have within the last three months bought several thousand bushels of corn at 40 cents a bushel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FUNSTON. I would like to have a little more time.

A MEMBER. Give him more time.

Mr. REED. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. FUNSTON. I want to say in addition, inasmuch as it seems that nothing can occur in this House, that no calamity can be pointed out without pointing to Kansas, and that, too, by her own Representatives [laughter]—I want to say to the people of this country that Kansas is paying off her indebtedness at the rate of a million dollars monthly [applause on the Republican side]; and that in the next few years she will stand before the country with every dollar of her indebtedness paid. [Cries of "Good!"] I want to say further to you, Mr. Speaker, that not only will Kansas pay her debts, but will pay them in as good money as she borrowed [applause on the Republican side], in gold, silver, and paper which is the equivalent of either; and I want also to say that whoever claims to represent my State by saying that we are in favor of issuing an unlimited amount of fiat money, redeemable in nothing, payable in nothing, misrepresents the very people whom he pretends to represent here. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, Kansas has had her misfortunes, but none greater than when she elected men to defend her on the floor of this House. But a change has come over her. In the last election the Republican party elected three-quarters of the Republican ticket, and the remainder of the People's party was only a relic of the past. [Cries of "Good!"] That time has passed over, and my word for it, when Kansas comes into line next fall it will be with the grand old Republican majority of 80,000. [Laughter and applause, and cries of "Mr. SIMPSON!"]

Mr. ALDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALDERSON. Would a motion be in order here to take a recess for five minutes, in order that Brother SIMPSON may be received in the Democratic party?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The House will be in order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that this discussion has degenerated into a controversy in regard to the merits or demerits of the Democratic and the People's party in Kansas, and in regard to their relative strength. I merely called the attention of the House to the fact that my colleague [Mr. FUNSTON], who has been posing as a "farmer" and who has run as a farmer on the Republican ticket, was an example of the ignorance of the farmers as a class that the Republican party put forward to represent them in Congress, and that therefore the farmers had been misrepresented here. [Laughter.] I have but a few words to offer in reply to what the gentleman has said. As to his warning to me against falling into the lap of the Delilah of the Democratic party, I want to say that it is quite unnecessary. There is no danger. He had better reserve his warnings for his own party, because, as a matter of fact, as he knows and as every intelligent man in Kansas knows, the Republican party did fall into the lap of the Democratic Delilah in Kansas during the last election. [Laughter.] They found themselves in such sore straits that they had to unite with the Democratic party to secure themselves against defeat in that State.

Now, in regard to the prosperity of the State, the gentleman says that Kansas has been in the gripes—I believe that was his expression. That is true; but, thank God and the People's party, Kansas is out of that condition now. We have got control of the State, so to speak, and the prosperity of the people has improved and increased, dating from the day when the Alliance or the People's party got control. Under Republican rule that State, which had come fresh from the hands of nature, without a dollar of debt or a mortgage upon it, was so managed that to-day it has a debt in farm and home mortgages of $170 per capita for every man, woman, and child in the State. The gentleman says we are paying them off. Yes, sir, we are paying them off because the sheriff is foreclosing the mortgages and the mortgage companies are taking the land, and to-day in that State homeless women and men are wetting the soil of Kansas with their tears because, owing to the pernicious policy of the Republican party, they find themselves without homes.

Now, as far as the Democratic party is concerned, or as far as the Republican party is concerned, I will vote for any measure that will relieve the condition of those people or furnish them the means to relieve themselves and to pay off this debt, but I would not like to limit them to gold, there not being gold enough in the United States to fill the old rotten teeth, let alone enough to pay the debt that hangs over the people. Besides, we did not borrow gold. But I would pay the creditors in money of full legal tender, representing the value of all the property in the country. That is all the difference there is between the gentleman and myself. I will not further detain the House. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, if the House can return for a moment from the plains of "bleeding Kansas" I should like to make a few remarks in regard to the rules, which I believe we have had at times during the day under discussion. [Laughter.] The rules of the Fiftieth Congress carried the system of not doing the public business to a very high point of perfection. In every highway and byway which a bill might pass to enactment those rules blocked the path and set up a sign of "No thoroughfare." This was the condition which the Fifty-first Congress tried to reform. The principle which ran through all the changes then made was to open up some of those blockaded paths so as to permit legislative movement.

In the rules now presented by the majority of the committee that central principle of opening up some way for legislative movement has been recognized in two important respects, to which I shall presently advert; but I regret to see that in other directions they have replaced some of the old obstructions, and one in particular, which I trust the House will strike out. It is the clause to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] has referred, and in regard to which he has offered an amendment. I mean the rule giving privilege to the motions to adjourn to a day certain and to take a recess. I have no desire to speak disrespectfully of those motions; for when we are talking about the rules we can never tell when we may run on to the "natural and inalienable rights of man." [Laughter.] The "natural and inalienable rights," those with which a man is born, and which no majority can take from him any more than they can take the color of his eyes or of his hair or of his skin. [Laughter.] I can hardly believe, however, that the right to make a motion to adjourn to a time certain or to take a recess is one of these "natural and inalienable rights" born with a man when he comes into the world. [Laughter.] I venture to think that they are purely artificial, and I have never understood why they should exist as highly privileged motions.

I am strongly of opinion that they should not be privileged, and yet, taking away their privilege, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] proposes, does not put a stop to filibustering. It simply gets rid of the easiest method of doing it, for the use of those motions is something so simple that it might be successfully worked in an asylum for the feeble-minded. It does not require even a common-school education or the ability to read and write in order to take advantage of those two motions in such a way as to stop the business of this House. If a man knows how to tell the time and read the hours on the face of the clock he can use those motions so as to arrest business here; and every gentleman who was a member of the Fiftieth Congress has seen it done.

Now I submit that even those who love filibustering, and who regard it as one of the "inalienable rights of man," should at least, out of respect for the proceeding if for no other reason, dispense with giving privilege to these two motions. It is not too much to ask that filibustering should require some intellectual effort. I think, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana strikes at a very objectionable form of filibustering, and although it would be far from arresting it altogether, it would get rid of one kind, for which we should be duly thankful.

I now come to the two points to which I said I should advert with respect to which the Committee on Rules has followed the principle of the Fifty-first Congress and opened a way for legislation. One is to legislate by the method of "riders" on appropriation bills, and the other by the power which they have put in the hands of the Committee on Rules. A "rider" on an appropriation bill is a thoroughly mischievous way of doing business, and ought to be voted down, as it was by another Democratic Congress. It really does not deserve argument. The other proposition to put power into the hands of the Committee on Rules is one for which I at least have no disapproval. It is well, I think, that we should open some method for doing business; and I am glad that at least the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] are to have an opportunity to do business, even if nobody else has. It is something that they should have such opportunity, instead of there being "no thoroughfare" marked over absolutely every line of action.

Moreover, I believe the Committee on Rules, or a majority of that committee, representing the majority of the House, ought to have the power to fix the order of business.

The only fault I find in this respect is that I think the committee has adopted a clumsy and too limited way of reaching the same result that we reached in the Fifty-first Congress. That result was simply getting responsibility somewhere in this House, and putting an end to the proposition which had been constantly advanced that a majority could not act because the rules prevented.

It has been demonstrated by the action of the last Congress that any majority can act in this House if they choose to do so. It makes no difference whether that majority meet here and vote down a given measure, whatever it may be, or whether they strangle it by rules; it is still their action. No set of rules can shift the responsibility which lies on the majority. I am glad the committee has given expression to this idea in the power which they propose to intrust to the Committee on Rules. But if they had not given expression to the idea the fact would have remained. No majority can longer find shelter behind rules. With them will rest the responsibility for the action of this House, whether they smother measures, whether they kill them, or whether they pass them. I only hope that we shall so amend and perfect these proposed rules as to open the way still further for the transaction of the public business. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has twenty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. REED. What time is left on the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty-five minutes.

Mr. CATCHINGS (after a conference with Mr. REED). I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

The following proposed amendments to the report of the Committee on Rules were handed to the Clerk to be printed in the RECORD:
